

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

THE sketches in this little volume have been prepared with the consent, and in most instances with the assistance, of the authors represented; to whom, together with Dr. J. R. Nichols and the Hon. G. B. Loring, the writer offers his thanks. Mr. Loring, who was the classmate of Lowell, has communicated some recollections of that poet's youth, while Dr. Nichols has done a similar service in the case of Whittier. Thanks are also due to Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., for permission to use extracts from several books published by them.

BOYHOOD OF LIVING AUTHORS.

THERE is a pleasant little house in Beacon Street, Boston, which is occupied by a gentleman who has written some books which have made his name famous wherever the English language is spoken, and also in many other countries into the language of which they have been translated. As he goes along the streets of the town, with a friendly, observant eye, which has a bird-like quickness, people who see him whisper — those who are unmannered point at him — and say, “See, the Autocrat!”

He is probably referred to thus as often as by his proper name; and this is because one of his books is called “The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table,” a volume full of wisdom and humor, which on one page moves us to tears, and in the next sets us shaking with laughter. He is a rather slender gentleman, with white hair, though no one would guess him to be over seventy-five; and the wavy white hair on his head is matched by white side-whiskers of an English cut. He is not distinctly a writer for the young; writing of any kind has not been the business of his life, indeed, and aside from it he has made himself famous in the medical profession: but there are few boys or girls who, though they may not have read "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" all through, do not know by heart "The Chambered Nautilus" and the story of the deacon's "One-hoss Shay."

"Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss shay
That was built in such a logical way?
It ran a hundred years to a day,
And then, of a sudden, it — Ah, but stay!
I'll tell you what happened without delay;
Scaring the parson into fits,
Frightening people out of their wits, —
Have you heard of that, I say?"

It is Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes I am speaking about ; one of the two survivors of that splendid period of American literature which gave us Longfellow, Motley, Emerson, and Lowell.

The doctor's study in the house in Beacon Street looks out over the Charles River ; and it is a question whether the view from the windows is more beautiful at night, when the electric lights on the bridge cast their reflections on the water like javelins of glittering silver, or in the day, when the gray stream flowing to the sea, and the spires and towers of Cambridge, with the green hills of Arlington and Belmont beyond, are visible. It is at all times a view of which Boston people are very proud ; and, aside from its beauty, it has the added interest to the doctor of encompassing nearly all the scenes of his youth, and of his manhood too.

He was born at Cambridge, and went to school at Cambridgeport, and both of those places are in sight from his windows. All his past is unfolded there ; and when he turns from the book or manuscript on his desk, near which hangs the portrait of his renowned ancestress, "Dorothy Q.," he can see the paths his feet have followed since the beginning.

He can see himself at various ages: the urchin straggling to school, through fields which are green only in the memory now; the Harvard student; and then, in one person, the college professor and the famous author. No doubt he finds it hard to believe that the urchin was not another fellow altogether, instead of the self-same sapling that he himself once was; but, though the identity is confusing, he can remember the boy well, and all his queer fancies, amusements, and chums.

A moderately studious boy he was, fond of reading stories, especially "The Arabian Nights;" fond of whispering, and whittling, as his desk showed; a little mischievous; sound in mind and in body, but more than usually imaginative. "No Roman sooth-sayer," he says in one of his books, "ever had such a catalogue of omens as I found in the sibylline leaves of my childhood. That trick of throwing a stone at a tree, and attaching some mighty issue to hitting or missing, which you will find mentioned in one or more biographies, I well remember. Stepping on or over certain particular things, — Dr. Johnson's especial weakness, — I got the habit of at a very early age.

“With these follies mingled sweet delusions, which I loved so well I would not outgrow them, even when it required a voluntary effort to put a momentary trust in them. Here is one I cannot help telling you : —

“The firing of the great guns at the Navy-Yard is easily heard at the place where I was born and lived. ‘There is a ship of war come in,’ they used to say when they heard them. Of course, I supposed that such vessels came in unexpectedly, after indefinite years of absence, — suddenly as fallen stones, — and that the great guns roared in their astonishment and delight at the sight of the old war-ship splitting the bay with her cut-water. Now, the sloop-of-war the ‘Wasp,’ Capt. Blakely, after gloriously capturing the

6     BOYHOOD OF LIVING AUTHORS.

‘Reindeer’ and the ‘Avon,’ had disappeared from the face of the ocean, and was supposed to be lost. But there was no proof of it, and of course, for a time, hopes were entertained that she might be heard from. Long after the last chance had utterly vanished, I pleased myself with the fond illusion that somewhere on the waste of waters she was still floating; and there were years during which I never heard the sound of the great guns booming inland from the Navy-Yard without saying to myself, ‘The “Wasp” has come!’ and almost thinking I could see her, as she rolled in, crumpling the water before her, weather-beaten, barnacled, with shattered spars and threadbare canvas, welcomed by the shouts and tears of thousands.

“This was one of the dreams that I nursed and never told. Let me make a clean breast of it now, and say, that so late as to have outgrown childhood, perhaps to have got far on to manhood, when the roar of the cannon has struck suddenly on my ear, I have started with a thrill of vague expectation and tremulous delight, and the long-unspoken words have articulated themselves in the mind's dumb whisper, 'The "Wasp" has come ! ' "

Dr. Holmes was born on the 29th of August, 1809, and one of the earliest things he can remember is giving three cheers for the close of the war of 1812. Until about two years ago, when it was pulled down, his birthplace stood on the edge of the college grounds at Cambridge ; and the old " gambrel-roofed " house was one of the sights of the town which visitors seldom missed.

" " Gambrel ! gambrel ! " — Let me beg
You'll look at a horse's hinder leg, —
First great angle above the hoof, —
That's the gambrel : hence gambrel-roof."

It had been the headquarters of the American army during the siege of Boston ; and when Oliver Wendell was born, it was the parsonage of his father, who was pastor of the First Church. A rambling, roomy old house it was, with untenanted upper chambers that were always locked, and a garret where strange noises could be heard,

8 BOYHOOD OF LIVING AUTHORS.

— the very place, in the imagination of a little boy, for ghosts and creatures from fairy-land. Then there was a dark store-room ; and peeping through the keyhole he could see heaps of chairs and tables, and he fancied that somehow they had rushed in there frightened, and had huddled together and climbed upon each other's backs for protection. Sometimes he thought he could hear the swords and spurs of soldiers clanking in the passages ; and the floor of his father's study was covered with dents left by the butts of the muskets of the armed men who had used it as a council-chamber.

Upstairs there was the portrait of a lady, with sword-thrusts through it, — marks of the British officers' rapiers, — and this is the same picture that now hangs on the wall of the library in Beacon Street.

On her hand a parrot green
Sits unmoving, and broods serene.
Hold up the canvas full in view —
Look, there's a rent the light shines through !
Dark with a century's fringe of dust,
That was a Red-coat's rapier thrust."

Who has not heard of that picture of Dorothy Quincy, or, as she is familiarly called Dorothy Q., the Autocrat's great-grandmother? His musical verses have engraved it in the minds of thousands who never saw it, or even a reproduction of it.

Cambridge was then a country village, and it was a pleasant walk through fields and lanes to the school in Cambridgeport, to which Oliver Wendell was sent when he was scarcely out of his infancy, — pleasant when he had company; but he had more than his share of childish fancies, and on his way there was a great wooden hand — a glove-maker's sign — which used to swing and creak, and fill him with terror.

"Oh, the dreadful hand!" he says in one of his essays, "always hanging there ready to catch up a little boy who would come home to supper no more, nor get to bed, — whose porringer would be laid away empty thenceforth, and his half-worn shoes wait until his smaller brother grew to fit them!"

Then there were encounters with the "Port-chucks," — as the Cambridge boys called the boys of Cambridgeport, — and any new article of dress was sure to be criticised by these young Philistines. One morning Oliver Wendell had on a new hat of Leghorn straw.

“Hullo, you-sir,” said a “Port-chuck,” “yoo know th’ wuz gon-to be a race to-morrah?”

“No,” replied Oliver innocently. “Who’s gon-to run, ’n’ where ’s ’t gon-to be?”

“Squire Mico ’n’ Doctor Williams, round the brim o’ your hat.”

The “Port-chuck” put his tongue into his cheek, and Oliver saw that he had been trifled with.

The school was kept by a stout old lady, called Dame Prentiss, who ruled the children with a long willow rod, which reached across the room. It was used for reminding rather than for chastising, however; and when one rod gave out, the scholars had no hesitation in providing her with a new one, which they went into the fields for themselves. Now and then a ferule was the instrument of punishment; and on one occasion, when Oliver had been caught whittling his desk, the dame brought it down across his hand with startling results: it fell into pieces as it touched his palm, though this was probably due to a flaw in the material of the ferule rather than to the toughness of the boy.

When he had outgrown petticoats, he went to other schools in Cambridgeport; and he had among his schoolmates Alfred Lee, who afterwards became Bishop of Delaware; Margaret Fuller; and Richard Henry Dana, the author of that fascinating sea-story, "Two Years Before the Mast."

So far he had always lived in the old home with the gambrel roof, which had been growing dearer and dearer to him; but at the age of fifteen he entered the Phillips Academy at Andover, and then for the first time he felt the pangs of homesickness. His year there was not very happy.

"The clock was dreadfully slow in striking the hour when recess began, and the professors looked as if they were always thinking of death," he said to the writer of this sketch not long ago.

12 BOYHOOD OF LIVING AUTHORS.

But he had pleasant memories of Andover, too ; and in 1878, when the academy was a century old, he went back and read a beautiful poem describing the sensations with which he entered it : —

“The morning came : I reached the classic hall ;
A clock-face eyed me staring from the wall ;
Beneath its hands a printed line I read : —
YOUTH IS LIFE'S SEED-TIME ; so the clock-face said.
Some took its counsel, as the sequel showed — Sowed — their wild oats, and reaped as they had sowed.

“How all comes back ! the upward slanting floor ;
The masters' thrones that flank the central door ;
The long outstretching alleys that divide
The rows of desks that stand on either side ;
The staring boys, a face to every desk,
Bright, dull, pale, blooming, common, picturesque.

“Grave is the Master's look ; his forehead wears
Thick rows of wrinkles, fruits of worrying cares ;
Uneasy lie the heads of all that rule, —
His most of all whose kingdom is a school.
Supreme he sits ; before the awful frown
That bends his brows, the boldest eye goes down ;
Not more submissive Israel heard and saw
At Sinai's foot the Giver of the Law.”

After a year at Andover, Oliver Wendell entered Harvard University; and while he was there, he maintained a fair rank for scholarship. Then he studied law for a year; and after that he chose what was to be the occupation of his life,—the study and practice of medicine.

His literary gifts were already known. When he was about twenty-one, the old frigate "Constitution," or the "Old Ironsides" as she was called, lay in the Charlestown Navy-Yard, and the Government proposed to break her up. Some stirring lines protesting against her destruction appeared in "The Boston Advertiser," from which they were copied by other newspapers, and then circulated on printed slips. They aroused such enthusiasm in favor of the old ship, that the Government consented to her preservation, and the author found his name on every lip: it was Oliver Wendell Holmes. Other verses, including "The Height of the Ridiculous," came from the same pen, which were no less popular; and the young poet had encouragement enough to leave the laboratory, and devote himself to the quill. But he remembered, no doubt, what a wise man once said about literature as a profession: it is a good walking-stick, but a poor crutch. He continued to be a doctor, and rose to eminence as a professor in the Harvard Medical School; but in his spare hours he cultivated the genius which is as radiant as a star in his books.

THE HEIGHT OF THE RIDICULOUS.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

I wrote some lines once on a time,
In wondrous merry mood,
And thought, as usual, men would say
They were exceeding good.

They were so queer, so very queer,
I laughed as I would die:
Albeit, in the general way,
A sober man am I.

I called my servant, and he came:
How kind it was of him
To mind a slender man like me,
He of the mighty limb!

"These to the printer !" I exclaimed,
And in my humorous way
I added (as a trifling jest),
"There'll be the devil to pay."

He took the paper, and I watched,
And saw him peep within :
At the first line he read, his face
Was all upon the grin.

He read the next : the grin grew broad,
And shot from ear to ear ;
He read the third : a chuckling noise
I now began to hear.

The fourth : he broke into a roar ;
The fifth : his waistband split ;
The sixth : he burst five buttons off,
And tumbled in a fit.

Ten days and nights, with sleepless eyes
I watched that wretched man :
And since, I never dare to write
As funny as I can.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

A GOOD many years ago now, a small bare-legged boy set out from his home in Portsmouth, N.H., for an afternoon's sport with a gun. He rambled along, as boys will, with his eyes wide open for every thing that came under them, as well as for the game that was the special object of his expedition ; and he had not gone far when he saw a chaise approaching, driven by the Governor of the State.

The Governor was a very popular and distinguished man, who was being talked of for the Presidency ; and we should not have liked the small boy if he had not been a little overawed by finding himself alone in the presence of so august a personage. He was equal to the occasion, however ; and as the chaise reached him, he stood aside to let it pass, and gravely presented arms. The Governor at once pulled up his horse, and looked with amusement at the little fellow standing there as serious as a sentry, with his gun held rigidly before him.

"What is your name?" said the Governor.

"Thomas Bailey Aldrich," replied the boy, with a military salute.

He was invited into the chaise; and though he lost his shooting, what was that in comparison with the distinction of riding into Portsmouth Town with Governor Woodbury?

This was forty years ago, and since then Thomas Bailey Aldrich has earned a place among the foremost of American authors by a series of books, some in prose and some in verse, which are distinguished by the purity of their tone, the refinement of their style, and the picturesqueness of their invention. One of them is called "The Story of a Bad Boy;" and except that some of the names of persons and places are changed, it is so faithful a picture of the author's boyhood that it might be called an autobiography. If any one has not read that book, I advise him to do so at once; and when he has finished it, he will, I think, be ready to thank me for introducing it to him.

“Not such a very bad boy, but a pretty bad boy,” the author says of himself. A pretty good boy we should call him,—a boy who would do nothing mean, cruel, or vulgar, though he was as ready for mischief as any of his playfellows.

One cannot imagine a better place than Portsmouth for the bringing up of such a boy. It is a romantic old town by the sea, full of quaint old homesteads. It is built at the mouth of the Piscataqua River, and may be said to have been founded by Capt. John Smith, the famous adventurer, who, after slaying Turks in hand-to-hand combats, and doing all sorts of doughty deeds in various parts of the globe, visited the coast of New Hampshire in 1612, and recommended this as the site of a future seaport.

Time was when Portsmouth carried on a great trade with the West Indies, and threatened to eclipse both Boston and New York; it turned out the best ships and the smartest sailors, and in the war of 1812 it equipped many a daring privateer. But its prosperity slipped away from it; and all the old wharves are now deserted, though when the sun shines upon them it brings out a vague perfume of the cargoes of rum, molasses, and spice, that used to be piled upon them.

What boy wandering along wharves like these, and hearing from superannuated sailors of the former glories of the place, would not long to go to sea? There were few boys in Rivermouth, as it is called in "The Story of a Bad Boy," who had not this ambition; and early in life Aldrich began the study of navigation, though he was not destined to use his knowledge in picking paths across the sea by the aid of the sun and stars.

The wharves were not the only stimulus to the spirit of romance in this old town. In the shady streets were historic houses in which Washington, Lafayette, and the King of the French had been entertained; the ghosts of former greatness seemed to haunt them; dark wainscot stood high against the walls; strange carvings with winged heads clustered about the doors; shadowy portraits of bewigged gentlemen and furbelowed dames, each with some legend attached to it, hung from the mouldings; and winding stairways led into mysterious chambers under the roofs. It seems to me that an imaginative boy brought up amid such surroundings was bound to become either a sailor or an author, — that he would either yield to the fascinations of the wharves, and go to sea, or stay ashore to write the stories and the poems which would be sure to come into his head in the presence of these relics of an historic past.

In one of those old houses which still stand in Court Street, where it is now used as a hospital, Aldrich was born, just forty-nine years ago; that is, in 1837. His father was a merchant and banker who had opened a business in New Orleans; and it was the custom of his parents to keep the boy, who was their only child, with them in the South during the winter, and to send him back to Portsmouth for the summer. These visits were continued until he reached the age of thirteen, when he returned to Portsmouth to remain there for several years; and it was in this old town that all which was most memorable in his boyhood occurred.

He was a rather slender little fellow, but sound and vigorous, and ever ready for either sport or mischief. As many mis-haps befell him as usually fall to the lot of a high-spirited and adventurous boy. He could defend himself from imposition, and he was expert in the various games which occupied his comrades. He was not a prodigy in any way; not marvellous either for his scholarship or his promise of future distinction. But he was very fond of reading, and spent many hours in a delightful old attic, where he found a lot of old books, among others being "Robinson Crusoe," "Baron Trenck," "Don Quixote," "The Arabian Nights," Defoe's "History of the Plague in London," and "Tristram Shandy." Of all these, Defoe's "History of the Plague" was his favorite.

Like all attics in old New-England houses, this one was the receptacle of all kinds of rubbish. "They never throw any thing away in New England," Aldrich said to me one day: "they always put it up in the attic." And here were cast-off clothing, legless chairs, crazy tables, and all sorts of things which time, and changes in fashions, had rendered useless.

Among the rest was an old hide-covered trunk; and seeing how little hair was left on it, Thomas Bailey thought he would attempt to restore it. He had seen in the window of a barber's shop a preparation which was highly recommended as a sure cure for baldness; and he purchased a bottle of this, and carefully applied it to the trunk. Then he went up stairs from day to day to watch the effect, but the result was not satisfactory; the trunk remained as bald as ever, and Thomas Bailey felt that he had wasted his money.

The first school he went to was Dame Bagley's; and from what he has told me of her, I shall always think of her as a character who ought to have belonged to one of Hawthorne's romances. She was a severe and angular person, who had a peculiar method of punishing her pupils. She constantly wore on the second finger of her right hand an uncommonly heavy thimble, and with this she would sharply rap the offender on the head. "Thomas Bailey, come here!" Tap, tap, tap, tap! It does not seem like a severe penalty; but she brought her finger down with such force, that the culprit often felt that it was going right through him.

The boy was not very happy with Dame Bagley, whose school was a dreary, uncomfortable place. The yard was bricked, and just one brick had been lifted out to allow a solitary cucumber-vine to spring up; this was what Dame Bagley would probably have called "a richly-wooded landscape." And then the benches in the schoolroom were too high for his legs. His feet could not reach the floor, and his back would grow so tired that sometimes he threw himself backward upon the floor in sheer desperation.

It was an altogether pleasant change when he left Dame Bagley's, and became enrolled as a pupil at the Temple School.

The Temple School is constantly referred to in "The Story of a Bad Boy" as the Temple Grammar School, and nearly every thing which relates to the latter is true of the former; so that the reader can get a better idea of Aldrich's boyhood from that book than I can give him here. The mad pranks of the boys when he was initiated as a member of the Rivermouth Centipedes; the fight on Slatter's Hill, that Gettysburg of snowballs; the burning of the stage-coach, — all the adventures were described from real life. There is a wonderful pony in the book, and the pony is from real life too. According to the story, the Temple Grammar School was burned down one Fourth of July by a fire-cracker that flew in through a window. This was fiction at the time the book was published; but five years afterward, as if to make the chronicle veracious in every particular, the school was burned in just that way.

To my mind, one of the earliest signs Aldrich gave of his literary bent was his distaste for figures; arithmetic staggered him, and he confesses that he often had to seek help from his school-fellows. This was very wrong, of course; and the only excuse I can think of may not be regarded as an excuse at all, but rather as an aggravation of the offence. In return for the help he received in arithmetic, he revised the compositions of the class, and even went so far as entirely to write the essays of the boys who, though clever enough at figures, had no talent for literary exercises.

Before he reached the age of twelve, he had written a story called "Colenzo." It was about pirates and buccaneers, and the scene was on a tropical island, which was supposed to lie somewhere out at sea, about seven miles from Portsmouth. Then he wrote articles for one of the local papers; and to these utterances of precocious wisdom he signed the nom de plume, "Experience."

At sixteen, his school days came to an end; and, his father having died, he was sent to New York to become a clerk in his uncle's office. But day-books and ledgers had no more charm for him than elementary arithmetic; and by the time he reached twenty, he had broken loose from the counting-room, and won a recognized place for himself among the most original of American authors. Fourteen books now stand to his credit, — stories that linger in the mind like memories of sunny days, and poems that have the polish and brilliance of diamonds. Portsmouth, sometimes with its own name, sometimes as Rivermouth, is revived again and again in them; and in some charming verses he has celebrated his days on the Piscataqua, which were among the happiest, no doubt, that he has ever seen.

PISCATAQUA RIVER.

BY THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

Thou singest by the gleaming isles,
By woods, and fields of corn, —
Thou singest, and the sunlight smiles
Upon my birthday morn.

But I within a city, I,
So full of vague unrest,
Would almost give my life to lie
An hour upon thy breast !

To let the wherry listless go,
And, wrapt in dreamy joy,
Dip, and surge idly to and fro,
Like the red harbor-buoy ;

To sit in happy indolence,
To rest upon the oars,
And catch the heavy earthy scents
That blow from summer shores ;

To see the rounded sun go down,
And with its parting fires
Light up the windows of the town,
And burn the tapering spires ;

And then to hear the muffled tolls
From steeples slim and white,
And watch, among the Isles of Shoals,
The Beacon's orange light.

O River ! flowing to the main
Through woods, and fields of corn,
Hear thou my longing and my pain,
This sunny birthday morn ;

And take this song which sorrow shapes
To music like thine own,
And sing it to the cliffs and capes
And crags where I am known !

JOHN TOWNSEND TROWBRIDGE.

If any one has succeeded in representing the average American boy in fiction, it is Mr. Trowbridge. The boys in some books we know of are so unreal that it does not seem possible that the author has ever been a boy himself; they are either milk-sops or juvenile Munchausens. But all of Mr. Trowbridge's boys give us the effect of having been photographed from life, and their actions are as natural as their characters.

He does not picture them in marvellous exploits on the Cordilleras, or beating the record of Hall and Kane in the Arctic regions, or doing what no boys probably ever did, except in the imagination. They are shrewd, active, hard-working fellows, on the farm or in the country store, and their struggles and adventures are just of that kind which American boys go through everywhere. A good reason for this fidelity to nature is that Mr. Trowbridge himself was a typical American boy, and the experiences of his own youth are reflected in those of his characters.

“My hands were filled with common tasks,
My head with rare romances,” —

he says in one of his poems. He was familiar in his boyhood with the labor of the field, the drudgery of the farm, the contentions of the district school, and those aspirations which carry a boy up stairs, when his day's work is done, to study by a rush-light or a cracked lamp in a cold garret.

“Some of the Jack Hazard stories, especially ‘Jack,’ ‘A Chance for Himself,’ and ‘Doing His Best,’ contain very faithful descriptions of the farm life and scenes in which I was brought up,” he said to me one day. “Although you will not find much of me personally in those stories, the kind of school I sometimes went to is exactly pictured in ‘Doing His Best;’

and 'Peach Hill Farm,' where so much of the action takes place, was merely a fancy name for my father's farm in Ogden."

His account of his boyhood is quite as interesting as his stories, and I shall repeat it here in almost the very words he used in giving it to me.

His father was a farmer who in 1811 emigrated from the East to the wilderness of Western New York, making the journey in winter with a young wife, a little load of household goods, and an ox-team. Western New York was then a wilderness indeed. There was only one house where the city of Rochester now stands; and crossing the Genesee River on the ice, the pioneer settled eight miles beyond, cut down the trees, built a log house, and made a little farm in the woods.

In this log house a boy was born in the winter of 1827; and to him was given the name of John Townsend Trowbridge, John Townsend having been a benefactor of the father. He was not the first born, but the eighth of nine children, and it is easy to understand that there was no silver spoon for him. He lived the ordinary life of farm boys in that region, and went to school six or seven months of the year until he was about fourteen, after which time he went only during the winter term, and worked on the farm all summer.

Neither silver spoons, nor any other luxuries, were there. But his mother was a woman of a refined and devotional nature; and despite the load of care, his father was a cheerful man, a good musician, and a capital story-teller, who, when his stock of bear and panther stories had been exhausted, would sometimes amuse his children by talking to them in rhyme. There were books in the house, too; and in reading them the boy escaped the poverty of his surroundings, and was borne in imagination into the wonderland of the poets and romancers.

"I took up the study of French by myself under peculiar disadvantages, having none of the books which now render the acquisition of that language so easy; and learned to read and translate it in the chimney-corner, before I ever saw a person who was at all conversant with it," he tells us. Then he learned German and Latin in the same way and under the same disadvantages.

A boy who had spirit enough for this was sure to have ambitions ; and as he read Scott, Byron, and Moore, he had an extinguishable desire to write. Though he was vigorous, and fond of out-door sports, he was shy and reticent, and he never whispered his dreams even to his most intimate friend. But while he followed the plough he planned romances and composed verses, and at the end of the day stole into some quiet place and wrote them out.

This was the period in which he made his acquaintance with Moore's poem "Lalla Rookh ;" and he has described it in some verses, from which we have already quoted a line or two

"My hands were filled with common tasks,
My head with rare romances ;
My old straw hat was bursting out
With light locks and bright fancies.

"In field or wood, my thoughts threw off
The old prosaic trammels :
The sheep were grazing antelopes,
The cows, a train of camels.

"Under the shady apple-boughs,
The book was my companion ;
And while I read, the orchard spread
One mighty branching banyan.

"To mango-trees or almond groves,
Were changed the plums and quinces ;
I was the poet Feramorz,
And had, of course, my Princess.

"The well-curb was her canopied
Rich palanquin ; at twilight,
'Twas her pavilion overhead,
And not my garret skylight.

"Ah, Lalla Rookh ! O charmed book !
First love, in manhood slighted ;
To-day we rarely turn the page
In which our youth delighted."

When he was sixteen years old his father died ; and a year later he went to Illinois, where he had a sister living in DuPage County. The following winter he taught a school in the neighborhood ; and then he tried farming, though he had no taste for it. He spent more time in shooting grouse and hunting deer than in looking after his land ; and his crop was a failure, though not through any fault of his. His heart was set on authorship, and nothing else would satisfy him. Essays and poems were despatched now and then to country papers, and he tasted the never-to-be-forgotten ecstacy of seeing his name in print.

The general who has been victorious in battle, the astronomer who has found a new star, the explorer who leaps upon a shore which his feet are the first to touch, and even the poet himself when laurels are thick upon him, does not feel the exultation which throbs in the boy who sees his earliest song in print, and stands trembling at the portals of the temple which enshrines those who have enriched the world with good books. It is only a mirage, perhaps ; but though it fades and leaves him far away from that glorious company, for the moment it dazzles his sight.

A few bits of prose and verse in the columns of a country paper, for which he received no pay, were followed by "A New Year's Address," written for the carriers of the "Niagara Courier;" and this was the first literary work which brought him money. The amount was one dollar and a half, not a large sum, to be sure, but it convinced him that literature was his proper vocation; and he set out for New-York City to earn a living by his pen.

Even now, when publishers pay twenty times as much as they did then, an unknown lad coming to the city with such a purpose would have the hardest kind of a struggle. The chances are ten to one, that after a period of semi-starvation and repeated disappointments, he would have to give up, and seek his bread in some other employment. In Trowbridge's youth the circumstances were still harder, but his ambition was justified and fortified by a natural gift which was bound to find recognition. He had to climb the editorial stairs very often, and to go down them with a heavy heart, — a heart so heavy that if the rejected manuscript had been lead, it could not have made it heavier, — before success came to him. Once he had to drop the pen altogether, and to work at engraving gold pencil-cases in Jersey City, an employment which, if less congenial, was much more certain in its rewards than literature.

"I was more than once reduced to my last loaf," he says in a fragment of autobiography which he intrusted to me. "I lodged at that time in a house on Broadway, nearly opposite the Café des Mille Colonnes, where a band used to come out upon a balcony in the summer evenings and play tunes which to this day I can never hear without being instantly transported back to my garret and my crust. I do not remember, however, that I once lost hope in the darkest of these dark hours."

When looking about for employment in New York, he took some verses to Major Noah, the editor of "The Sunday Times," who treated him with great kindness, and counselled him to make literature his profession, but to write prose instead of poetry. Major Noah introduced him to some publishers, and to the editor of "The Dollar Magazine," which was so called because it was sent to subscribers for a dollar a year, though it earned a still further claim to the title by paying writers one dollar a page for their contributions. One of the stories which "The Dollar Magazine" accepted was copied into a popular London magazine, and into many publications in the United States; and Trowbridge thought that his fortune was made. But he found it impossible to live by writing for one dollar a page; and fancying that he had taken a step higher by sending to "The Knickerbocker Magazine" an article which was speedily published in its pages, he learned from the polite editor, with deep disappointment, that that highly respectable periodical never paid any thing at all for contributions from new writers.

Fame, which had been hovering over the garret in an uncertain way for some time, at last knocked at the door, however; and the farm-boy became the distinguished author.

Mr. Trowbridge now lives about five miles from Boston, in the pleasant suburb of Arlington, where he has a pleasant home on the banks of the historic Spy Pond. He takes high rank as a poet and as a novelist, but his chief distinction has been won in the field of juvenile literature.

I OFTEN hear it said that boys are not as crazy to go to sea as they used to be; that the charm of a sailor's life has been dispelled; that steamers making regular voyages from port to port, like ferry-boats, do not allow the imagination to play as it did when a voyage could be made only in a sailing ship, and when there were no ocean cables to keep us informed of arrivals and departures all over the world.

Imagination, of course, must have always had a good deal to do with the fascination of the sea; for a sailor's life has been recognized as a hard one in every period, and under all flags. But in the days of buccanniers and pirates, and when ships set forth on voyages to countries of which little or nothing was known, it was easier to lose sight of the privations to be endured than it is now when every land has been explored, and the traffic of the high seas has no more romance in it than a railway.

If the boys who think of going to sea are fewer than they were, however, the interest in nautical stories has not abated. Capt. Marryat has lost none of his charm, and a new writer of sea-stories has come up, whose works are said to be more popular in America than those of any other English novelist.

This is William Clark Russell, the author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor," "A Sailor's Sweetheart," "The Lady Maud," and several other books with which the readers of these lines are probably acquainted. I have no doubt that the reason his books are liked so much is that they are full of realities, and that he has been a sailor himself, and knows whereof he writes.

Although an Englishman, he was born at the Carlton House, Broadway, New York, on the 24th of February, 1844. His father was a composer and singer; and it was natural that the son of the author of that cheery song, "A Life on the Ocean Wave," should make the sea his theme when the time came for him to use a pen. He also inherited some of his literary tastes from his mother, who in her youth was intimately associated with Charles Lamb, De Quincey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, her father having been a brother of Charles Lloyd the poet. But it was not until he had been through many adventures, and had tried his hand at other things, that he became an author.

Returning to Europe, his father went to live at Boulogne, France, in a house named Château Lettsom, after the celebrated Dr. Lettsom, who had once occupied it; and here Clark Russell's early years were passed. He went to a private school in the town, and he found among his fellow-scholars three sons of Charles Dickens, — Frank, Alfred, and Sydney. Frank became his chum; they read the same stories, dreamed the same dreams, and by and by, when both were about eleven years of age, they conspired to run away from school and enter upon an expedition which was bound to make their fortunes. The purpose of the expedition was to shoot eider-ducks in Norway, of which they had read in some books of travel; and they calculated that the wealth of "Monte Cristo" would be exceeded by their profits from the sale of the feathers. But Frank Dickens was called home before their plans were matured; and his companion was doomed to remain at school two years more, at the end of which his parents decided that his wish to go to sea should be gratified.

Those who have read "My Watch Below" and "The Voyage to the Cape" will call to mind that in the former there is a story, "The Middie's Yarn," and in the latter a chapter called "It Acted Like a Charm." Both of these fragments are autobiographical, and if I wanted to deter a boy from going to sea I would not fail to place them in his hands.

A berth as a midshipman was found for Clark Russell in one of Duncan Dunbar's merchant ships, and the little fellow (only thirteen and a half years old) was sent down to the East India Docks in London to join her. It was a day of dreams and exultation for him, no doubt; he pictured himself as another "Robinson Crusoe;" and he swelled with self-importance when, after struggling along the crowded wharves and dodging in and out among the piles of merchandise, he passed the gangway, and stood upon the deck of his ship (his ship!) with the masts and spars and rigging criss-crossing the sky high above him.

When a boy wants to go to sea in America, he must get an appointment to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, if he wishes to enter the United-States service on a higher grade than that of the common sailor; and if he is content with the merchant-service, the only thing he can do is to ship as a foremast hand, and subject himself to all the miseries of life in the fore-castle. On many English ships, however, it is the custom to take midshipmen; and in view of the fact that they are berthed apart from the crew, they or their parents are required to pay a good round sum to the owners. This is what was done in the case of Clark Russell; but he found, as many boys had done before and have done since, that the amount paid as a "premium," as it is called, was money thrown away, and that the lot of a midshipman in the merchant-service is every bit as rough as that of poor Jack Tar in the fore-castle. He had not been on board many hours before he regretted the choice he had made, and the life of an adventurous mariner seemed very much less attractive than it had done in the story-books.

The space allotted to the midshipmen was "'tween decks," a dark, narrow bit of a room, with a table on stanchions running down it; and when Clark Russell stumbled into it, those who were to be his mess-mates were already there, skylarking, smoking, and stowing their mattresses in their bunks.

"Youngster," cried one of them, recognizing him as soon as he entered, "why don't you go down on all fours, and wag your tail? Don't you know you're a dog? You must be a dog, or you wouldn't go to sea. The sea's only a fit life for dogs."

"Stop till he's slung aloft to scrape down the mizzen-royal-mast in a gale of wind," said another; "then he'll find out why he's come to sea. — D'ye know where the mizzen-royal-mast is kept stowed? Go and ask the skipper to light you down into the lazarette, where you'll find the butcher's mate shelling pease. He has charge of the mizzen-mast, and is the only man allowed to serve out new dead-eyes when the ship's figure-head goes adrift and stops the fellow at the wheel from obeying orders."

The boy could not understand this "chaff," but it was more endurable than the rough usage which followed.

The first night at sea, a storm arose; and as the green-hand lay deadly sick in his bunk, he did not expect that he would have to get up when all hands were called to reef topsails. But, sick as he was, he was dragged on to his feet, and sent aloft. It was pitch dark, the rain driving along as if it meant to blind a man, and the wind blowing a gale; but he knew it would not do to skulk, and he staggered up the companion-way, and began to haul on a rope. Seeing him doing this, the third mate roared out his name, and ordered him to lay aft and jump aloft and help the other midshipmen to reef the mizzen-topsail.

The mizzen-topsail again! How hateful it sounded! "All three topsail halyards were loose," he tells us in "The Middie's Yarn," and "the canvas was banging in the darkness like great guns going off, all the crew, and idlers as well, singing out at the ropes, and the second mate in the waist and the chief mate aft shouting at the top of their voices."

He got into the lee shrouds, and climbed up until he came to the mizzen-top; but once there he was too dizzy and too weak to go higher. He sat down dreadfully sick, and wished himself dead. His cap was blown off his head, his boots were full of water, and, as he had no oilskins on, he was soaked to the skin by the rain and the spray. Here the sailors found him, and one of them, taking pity on him, shoved him through the "lubber's hole," and helped him down on deck again.

This was only the beginning; and when he came to have as little fear of going aloft as the best of them, he still had to put up with poor and insufficient food, and with all kinds of drudgery.

"I've scraped and greased down masts," he says, "painted the ship's side, tarred down, cleaned the brass-work, painted the quarter-boats; and I only wonder that the skipper didn't put us to washing up the cuddy-dishes and cleaning the knives."

Taking his own word for it that "The Middie's Yarn" is autobiographical, we find another passage in that sketch which shows us how much he endured on his first voyage:—

"I was in the chief mate's watch,—the port watch, it's called. Well, suppose we have the middle watch in; at four o'clock we're turned out and come on deck. It's still dark, and there's nothing to be done if the wind's steady and the ship is holding her course. But soon after the sun rises the pumps are rigged, and the watch turns to and washes the decks down. If it's fine warm weather, I pull off my boots; if not, I keep them on—sea-boots, of course. The midshipmen have to scrub the poop down; they lay hold of the brushes, and the third mate swills the water along. That was our way; but, of course, customs are different in different ships. We scrub under the hencoops, scrub the gratings abaft the wheel, clean the paint-work, and when that housemaid's job is over we swab and coil down and make the poop fit for the passengers to enjoy themselves upon. By the time all this is done, the brass-work cleaned, and so forth, it's past seven bells, and we go below to breakfast. I've already described our cabin, but you could never understand it without seeing a drawing of it. I once killed twenty-eight cockroaches in my bunk in twelve minutes. It wasn't only that our cabin was dark, and lumbered up with table and bunks, and our 'stores' stowed away in a corner alongside a dresser full of plates and dishes: we had a heap of emigrants in the 'tween decks; and what with the womens quabbling, and the children squalling, and the men growling, the row all day long was like an Irish riot. I say nothing of the different smells of the food and the washing-tubs. Well, we'd go below to breakfast; but what was there to eat? Biscuit, with a bit of yesterday's pork or beef,—but seldom that, for, bad as the food was, we youngsters were never so well supplied with salt meat but that we weren't always ready to eat each other's allowance,—and some black liquor called tea, with a mass of short yellow sticks floating atop of it. When I used to look at that food, how my conscience would prick me for having turned up my nose at the dinners on my father's table, saying, as I used to, to my mother, 'Mutton again—it's always mutton!' Or, 'Apple-tart! Why don't you give us plum-pudding for a change?' I'd have put up with mutton and apple-tart every day at sea, for months at a stretch, could I've got 'em. After breakfast the starboard watch would go on deck, and we of the port watch would turn in. At a quarter before twelve we'd rouse out to get dinner. This consisted of pork or beef. If it was pork day, we'd have some lukewarm, greasy water with a few dozen of yellow shot knocking about in it, called pea-soup, served out to us; if beef day, we'd get a calker of duff, looking to the eye like old yellow soap, and tasting—well, and tasting like duff; and more than that I can't say. Sometimes we'd have a few of our own preserved spuds—spuds means potatoes—cooked; but I could never endure the smell, much less the taste, of those things. Then we'd go on deck, where we'd be set to work at once on different jobs."

One voyage of this kind would cure any boy who had only a fancy for the sea, and send him home penitent; but Clark Russell had a deep love of blue water, and though he found that a sailor's life was not just what he had pictured it to be, there were charms in it that induced him to remain in the service of Duncan Dunbar. From midshipman he rose to be mate; and he made voyages to Australia, Madras, Calcutta, Hong Kong, and other places. On one occasion he lay for ten months in the Gulf of Pe-Chee-Lee, his ship being a transport carrying troops from Calcutta.

While he was still a very young man, however, he gave up the sea as a calling; and after two months spent in a stock-broker's office, he took up the pen, and entered on a literary career. Did he find this much easier than the sea? Not in the beginning. He sent a novel to an eminent firm of publishers; and after eight months of weary waiting, his manuscript was returned to him, "in a basket, like a leg of mutton," as he says. Other attempts were more successful, but the novel by which he afterward made his mark was rejected by at least one publisher before it was accepted. This was "The Wreck of the Grosvenor." Since that he has gone on writing sea stories, and it is his own experiences that give them life and interest.

LIBERAL as England is, a boy of poor birth, has not the unbounded possibilities of advancement in that country, which he would have in the United States; and though he may become a man of wealth, and sit in Parliament, it is not likely that, if his early life has been as humble as was Lincoln's or Garfield's, he will ever fill the position of prime minister. There is no law against it, and democracy is making such giant strides that in the near future we may see this exalted place filled by men who have come from the farm and the factory, who have worked with their hands, and known the extremes of poverty; but no one so poor, so weighted by disadvantages, as President Garfield was at the outset of his career, has ever yet been prime minister of England.

Even Disraeli, who is often pointed out as an example of what may be done in English political life by one who apparently has no prospects of success, was the son of a noted author, and was born in comfortable circumstances ; and we can recall no prime minister whose origin was humbler than his.

The upper and middle classes of society have always furnished the statesmen who have held this high office ; and Mr. Gladstone, who is included in this volume since he is scarcely less distinguished in literature than in politics, belongs to a substantial middle-class family. His father was a rich and influential merchant of Liverpool. He had a large fleet, and was himself a member of Parliament and a baronet, and when he died he left each of his children an ample fortune. The family was Scotch, and went to Liverpool from Leith. The great prime minister himself has said, " If Scotland is not ashamed of her sons, her sons are not ashamed of Scotland ; and the memory of the parents to whom I owe my being, combines with various other considerations to make me glad and thankful to remember that the blood which runs in my veins is exclusively Scottish."

William Ewart Gladstone, who spoke thus of his descent, was one of Sir John Gladstone's six children by his second wife, and was born on December 29, 1809, in Rodney Street, Liverpool.

Rodney Street is one of the most dismal thoroughfares in that rather dismal town; and, like all the other houses in it, the birthplace of the statesman, unaltered from what it was at the beginning of the century, except by the stains of age, is a plain, substantial dwelling, which English fogs have made as black as the inside of any chimney. But this was not the only home of the Gladstones. They had a house in London, and a country-place at Seaforth, which was then outside of Liverpool and its smoke and noise, though it is now knitted with the town. The little boy who was destined to become famous used to ramble about these grounds in company with his father's friend, the great Mr. Canning, who was already the foremost statesman of England.

Canning, it is said, would sit by the hour at Seaforth meditating on the policy of the country, while the boy sat quietly at his feet.

Indeed, all the circumstances of Mr. Gladstone's boyhood were fortunate. We do not find in his case, what we so often find in the lives of men who have risen to eminence in American politics, the obstacles of poverty, the necessity of self-education, the absence of encouragement. Here it is not a lad on a farm, who, after toiling all day in the fields, retreats to a cheerless attic to sit up half the night with some old text-books that he has picked up at a bargain; nor a student at a country college, pinching himself in order to pay for his tuition.

"The only things I inherited were ignorance and indigence," said Henry Clay, one of the greatest of American statesmen. Mr. Gladstone inherited money and social position, and from his infancy was surrounded by every influence which could help him.

Yet we all know how often splendid opportunities are misused, how wealth entails indolence, and the riches of scholarship are despised when they are most accessible. If Mr. Gladstone had not been animated by a lofty ambition, if he had been slothful or self-indulgent, his inheritance, his father's money, and the power of his father's friends could not have made him premier of England.

But he was alive to his responsibilities, and, though he was unhampered by such picturesque vicissitudes as we have spoken of, he could not have risen to his present high place except by the continuous industry and resolute purpose which have always distinguished him.

He was a sharp-witted, serious, precocious boy; and at the age of twelve he was sent to Eton, where Sir Robert Walpole, Pitt, Lord North, Charles James Fox, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Derby, and nearly all the prime ministers of England for a century and a half, had been educated. This famous school has been improved of late; but when Mr. Gladstone entered, it was governed in a very loose fashion, and lazy or incapable boys passed through it with little else to show for the years they spent there than a smattering of the classics. Needless to say, he was not one of these, but a diligent and insatiable student; and, though there were few inducements to excel in scholarship, he sought knowledge for the love of it, and took up studies which the authorities did not require.

Among the more intellectual boys it has long been a custom to issue amateur periodicals in which they may show their literary gifts; and in 1827 Mr. Gladstone began the publication of "The Eton Miscellany," to which he contributed both prose and verse. Among the latter is an epic upon Richard the Lion-hearted, King of England:—

"Who foremost now the deadly spear to dart,
And strike the javelin to the Moslem's heart?
Who foremost now to climb the leaguered wall,
The first to triumph, or the first to fall?
Lo, where the Moslems, rushing to the fight,
Back bear their squadrons in inglorious flight,
With pluméd helmet, and with glittering lance,
'Tis Richard bids his steel-clad bands advance;
'Tis Richard stalks along the blood-dyed plain,
And views unmoved the slaying and the slain;
'Tis Richard bathes his hands in Moslem blood,
And tinges Jordan with the purple flood."

The prose is in the form of essays, and in one of them the young author says of his efforts, "There is one stream which I dread my inability to stem. It is the tide of popular opinion.

" 'I have ventured
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
To try my fortune in a sea of glory,
But far beyond my depth.'

At present it is hope alone that buoys me up; for more substantial support I must be indebted to my own exertions, well knowing that in this land of literature merit never wants its reward. That such merit is mine, I dare not presume to think; but still there is something within me that bids me hope that I may be able to glide prosperously down the stream of public estimation."

Even thus early in his career his aspirations were political rather than literary, however, and there was something prophetic in an essay on "Eloquence" which he wrote for "The Eton Miscellany." The most elevated minds, he says, are usually devoted to the legislative halls at Westminster. "A successful début, an offer from the minister, a secretaryship of state, and even the premiership itself, are the objects which form the vista along which a young visionary loves to look."

In contemplating these objects himself, events proved that Mr. Gladstone was not a visionary. He left Eton at the age of eighteen, taking away with him all the good that school could confer. He had been popular among his fellow-scholars, and in the front of those who by their earnestness and brilliance gave the highest promise.

Then, after two years spent with a private tutor, who became Bishop of Calcutta, he entered Christ Church College, Oxford, and at that university distinguished himself by taking what is known there as a "double first," in other words, the highest honors both in classics and mathematics. He was also prominent in the Oxford Union, the university debating society, and had among his companions no less than six young men whom he afterwards drew around him in his cabinet when he became premier.

Leaving Oxford, he was, at the age of twenty-three, elected to Parliament for the borough of Newark. Every one has heard what a fiasco his great rival, Disraeli, made in his maiden speech ; how he was hooted and gayed, and how fiercely he declared that a time should come when he would be patiently listened to. Mr. Gladstone was received with favor from the first, and he at once commanded the respect and attention of his fellow-members by the modesty of his demeanor, the earnestness of his manner, and the fluency of his speech. His future was assured, and when only twenty-five he became an under-secretary in the government of Sir Robert Peel.

There is a picture of him as he appeared at this time, which little resembles him in his later years. The face is full and plump, and the eyes and eyebrows are dark. But the outward change has not been greater than the moral and intellectual change. He was a Conservative then, and was described as "the hope of the stern and unbending Tories." Now he is in advance of the Liberals. He has said, epigrammatically, that "the principle of the Conservative party is jealousy of liberty and of the people, only qualified by fear; while the policy of the Liberal party is trust in the people, qualified by prudence." His early political bias he has attributed, in a great measure, to his training at Oxford.

"I did not learn there what I have learned since," he has said, "to set a due value on the imperishable and the inestimable privileges of human liberty."

ONE of the chief uses of biography is in the power it has to cheer up those whose lives are beset with difficulties, and to awaken aspiration where hope has scarcely dared to sit. Many a boy has learned from the printed page the lesson that Bow bells rang out to Dick Whittington, and has found his courage renewed for fresh endeavor by the example set forth in the narrative of some life in which a greater adversity than his own has been doggedly resisted and overcome. Turning over the leaves of the book, he has seen the black letters of despair vanish, and all earthly attainments made possible to the youth who has patience and industry.

Such a lesson as this, not a new one, to be sure, is brought home to us once more when we look at the boyhood of Edward Eggleston, whose stories, among which are

"The Hoosier Schoolmaster," "The Mystery of Metropolisville," and "The End of the World," have placed him among the most successful and most original writers of fiction in America, while he has added to the distinction thus acquired by his work as an editor, an historian, and a poet.

He was born on the 10th of December, 1837, at Vevay, Indiana, — a country boy who had to contend not only with the disadvantages which loom up before every country boy who wants to lead an intellectual life, but also with frequent illnesses which came and paralyzed the hand when the lamp of ambition burned the brightest, and showed Fame in her most alluring garb.

A country boy is at a certain disadvantage in the matter of education now, but his opportunities are incalculably greater than what they were in the days of Edward Eggleston's boyhood. Then the rule of three was the objective point of all study, and it was thought that he who had ciphered through that had well-nigh exhausted human knowledge. The schoolmaster himself was often unable to spell the simplest words.

"The teaching was absurd," Mr. Eggleston says in one of his sketches. "I was made to go through Webster's spelling-book five times before I was thought fit to begin to read, and my mother, twenty years earlier, spelled it through nine times before she was allowed to begin Lindley Murray's 'English Reader.' As I recall the old-time school, I cannot but think that if its discipline was somewhat more brutal than the school discipline of to-day, its course of study was far less so. To a nervous child the old discipline was, indeed, very terrible. The long birch switches hanging on hooks against the wall haunted me night and day from the time I entered one of the old schools. And whenever there came an outburst between master and pupils, the thoughtless child often got the beating that should have fallen upon the malicious mischief-makers. As the master was always quick to fly into a passion, the fun-loving boys were always happy to stir him up. It was an exciting sport, like bull-baiting, or like poking sticks through a fence at a cross dog. Sometimes the ferocious master showed an ability on his own part to get some fun out of the conflict, as when on one occasion in a school in Ohio the boys were forbidden to attend a circus. Five or six of them went in spite of the prohibition. The next morning the schoolmaster called them out on the floor, and addressed them:—

“‘So you went to the circus, did you?’

“‘Yes, sir.’

“‘Well, the others did not get a chance to see the circus. I want you boys to show them what it looked like, and how the horses galloped around the ring. You will join your hands in a circle about the stove. Now start!’

“‘With that he began whipping them as they trotted around and around the stove.’”

But, few as the opportunities were, there never was a time in Indiana when a good school was not accounted a thing of the greatest value, and Mr. Eggleston tells a story of a raw-boned boy who knocked at the schoolmaster's door early one winter's morning to ask how he should do a "sum" which puzzled him. He had ridden a farm-horse many miles for this purpose, and had to be back home in time to begin his day's work as usual. The kind-hearted school-master, chafing his hands to keep them warm, sat down by the boy, and taught him how to do the "sum." Then the poor little fellow straightened himself up, and, thrusting his hand into his trousers pocket, pulled out a quarter of a dollar, explaining with a blush that it was all he could pay, for it was all he had. Of course the master made him put it back, and told him to come whenever he wanted any help.

The father of Edward Eggleston was a Virginian, a graduate of William and Mary College, who went to Indiana in early manhood, and achieved a place among the foremost men at the bar in the West. He died when he was a little more than thirty years of age, but he had already spent no little time in moulding the character of Edward, who was his oldest child. One day he said to him, —

"I'll tell you what my father told me, and his father told him, — never tell a lie, and knock down any man that says you do.”

The Egglestons were Southerners, and had always lived up to this family precept; but Edward omitted the knocking down part. On another occasion, when his father was a candidate for Congress, he said to the son, —

“I’m not going to live very long. Never do you have any thing to do with politics. In politics a man is as much disgusted with the rascality of his friends as of his enemies.”

It was not an eventful boyhood, this of Edward Eggleston. Part of it was spent in farm labor, and part in a country store. All his school days did not cover more than two years, and he may claim to be self-educated. Until he was ten years old he had the reputation of being dull despite his shrewdness, but after that he never had a schoolmate who could acquire knowledge more rapidly. He got more out of his habit of reading than out of his attendance at school, and he learned several languages by solitary study.

"Of the books that impressed me deeply when I was a boy," he says in a letter to the author of this sketch, "I remember particularly Franklin's autobiography, certain essays of Bishop Thomson, Young's 'Night-Thoughts,' and Pope's poetry, especially the 'Essay on Man.' When I was a little less than sixteen I was strongly impressed by Priestley's 'Exposition of the Hartleian System of Mental Philosophy,' and by Locke on the 'Conduct of the Human Understanding.' At sixteen I read with keen relish, but without entire agreement, certain of Lord Jeffrey's essays. I read few novels, for I was brought up a Methodist. I remember the delight I had at seventeen in Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' Irving's 'Sketch Book,' and Virgil's Eclogues, which last I read in the original alone. I was throughout my childhood and youth strongly influenced by Methodist literature, of which I read much, for my life was double. I was almost an enthusiast on one side, and a lad with a strong bent toward literature and learning on the other."

Ambitious as he was to be a scholar, there were weeks and months when he could not study, owing to illness, and the enforced idleness was a sore trial to him. Every road seemed barred to him by his ill health and uncertain tenure of life. There were times, however, when he was strong enough to take long walks with his brother, George Cary Eggleston, who has also become a notable author. They spent days together tramping over the hills and reveling in the beauties of the landscape spread out before them from the summits. They followed a plan of Edward's devising to economize strength, and secure the best results of exertion. He had observed that long rests stiffen the muscles, and he therefore determined that they should walk steadily for ten minutes, and then rest for three. This they did frequently for an entire day, from sunrise to sunset, without apparent hurt even to him; and to harden themselves still more, as they thought, they gave up their beds, and slept on the floor of their room. Edward made their walks still more interesting by his knowledge of geology, and gave the history of trilobites which George knocked out of perilous places in the face of the cliffs. Naturally Edward was too great an invalid for many of the sports of his playfellows. He was only a middling ball player, but he was a first-rate hand at king's base, which requires the fleetness of foot which he possessed in a remarkable degree, and in "bull-pen" — an old Middle State game, — he was the best dodger of them all.

"In all intellectual ways," says one of his old schoolfellows, "he was the recognized captain of every school he ever attended. Curiously enough he maintained another sort of ascendancy less easily accounted for. We were a robust set of fellows, rough in sport and energetic in all physical ways, and usually we had pity rather than sympathy or respect for physical weakness; but Edward always commanded the school on the playground as well as elsewhere. His word was as nearly law with us as any thing could be among a rather lawless set of youngsters. He was never thought of as a weakling at all; he asked no odds of anybody on account of his illness, and he took all his knocks as manfully as the most robust of us. But the peculiar regard in which he was held by his companions, and the undisputed command he exercised upon occasions, were due in a large part to two facts: first, that we all recognized him as our superior in knowledge and ability; and, secondly, that we knew him to be just in all his judgments and absolutely without fear or favor."

When he was about seventeen years old, he went in quest of health among his father's relatives in Virginia, and for five months he attended a boarding-school in Amelia County. This was the last schooling he ever had. His health continued poor, and in 1856, two years later, he went to Minnesota, where he became a jack-of-all-trades. He made himself useful on a farm, he joined the chain-gang of a surveying party, and he opened a photograph-gallery.

Then he returned to his native State, and, having always had a deep religious feeling, he started out as a circuit preacher, travelling from town to town with the Gospel in his saddle-bags. From hut to hut, we ought to say, rather than from town to town, for the path of the circuit preacher lay through the wilderness to places in which there were no regular churches.

All this time, however, he was gathering materials for the stories that were afterward to make him famous. As many others have done, he made his entrance into the profession of literature through journalism, which is a sort of half-sister to it; and he was successively connected with "The Little Corporal" (then an excellent magazine for young people), "The Independent" and "Hearth and Home," a once popular weekly. It was while he was editor of the latter that he wrote "The Hoosier Schoolmaster," which a distinguished critic has said is as faithful a picture of life in Southern Indiana forty years ago as Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" is of life in England after the Norman conquest. Its success was extraordinary from the appearance of the first instalment; and, when it afterward came out in book form, it rivalled in popularity "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "Little Women." Even now, after fifteen years, it sells better than most new works; and the reason is, that it is true to life. It has been followed by half a dozen other stories, among which are "Roxxy" and "The Hoosier Schoolboy." We are probably not violating a confidence in repeating what the author has said to us: "I have drawn my native village—Vevay, Indiana—in 'Roxxy' and in 'The Hoosier Schoolboy,' and my stories are full of the reflections of my childhood, but of undiluted autobiography there is little."

As the dusk was setting in on a beautiful autumnal day about thirty-seven years ago, a man and a boy were driving a cow along a country road in Ohio. They had come a long distance, and were weary; but though the boy limped, the conversation did not flag as they trudged along; and you might have seen that while they talked with such animation, they were alive to the gold and crimson of the autumn woods, which seemed to have borrowed their flashes of color from the sunset sky.

They were evidently not farmers; both had the appearance of living a city life, but had they been observed, the things they were saying, and not their looks, would have attracted attention; for they were talking of Cervantes and Shakspeare.

The cow needed much urging, and it was late at night when they reached some white-limbed sycamores beside the tail-race of a grist-mill on the Little Miami River, on the other side of which was the small log cabin in which they lived. A question then arose as to how they should get the cow across. They did not know the depth of the water, but they knew it to be cold, and they did not care to swim it. The elder wanted the boy to run up under the sycamores to the saw-mill, cross the head-race there, and come back to receive the cow on the other side of the tail-race. But with all his literature, the boy was young enough to be superstitious, and afraid of the dark; and though the elder urged him to go, he would not force him. They could see the lights in the cabin twinkling cheerfully, and they shouted to those within, but no one heard them. They called and called in vain, and were answered only by the cold rush of the tail-race, the rustle of sycamore leaves, and the homesick lowing of the cow.

They determined to drive her across from the shore, and then to run up to the saw-mill and down the other bank, so as to catch her as she reached it. When they came there, she was not to be found, however; she had instantly turned again, and during the night she made her way back to the town from which they had brought her.

The log cabin was a small one, with a cornfield of eighty acres behind it, and it was nearly a quarter of a century old. The boy who entered it after this adventure was William Dean Howells, and the man was his father, who had recently brought his family from Dayton to take charge of the saw-mill and grist-mill on the river. The incident illustrates, with what follows, the simplicity of the early life of one who has since become one of the foremost American novelists.

Mr. Howells was born March 1, 1837, at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, opposite Wheeling, West Virginia. His father was of Welsh descent, his mother of German stock, and both were superior by education and tastes to the moderate circumstances in which they found themselves when this boy, who was one of eight children, came into the world. When he was only three years old, they left Martin's Ferry to live in Hamilton, Ohio, and there the father bought and edited the "Intelligencer," a weekly newspaper, and his son was scarcely out of his cradle before he learned to set type. He had little regular schooling, but he was a great reader, and had a natural gift for composition. He does not remember how young he was when he mastered the mysteries of the printer's trade, but it was certainly long before he was twelve; at that age he remembers having helped in his father's office to set in type President Zachary Taylor's inaugural message.

There were leisure moments between the working hours, and he occupied these in printing compositions of his own. However precocious they may be, few young authors see their work immortalized by the dignity and permanence of type before they reach their teens; but when this lad was only eleven, he set up and printed an ambitious work of his own. A thoroughbred is not less fearless of ditch and hedge than the budding author is of the magnitude of his theme. A veteran will stoop to write about rag-pickers or Punch and Judy, and go afoot in search of a commonplace subject; but the beginner plunges his spurs into the flanks of Pegasus, and sends the winged horse galloping along the edge of the dizzyest precipices of Olympus. Mr. Howells is called a "realist" now. He writes about men and women as they are, and will have neither villains of deep dye nor paragons of virtue in his stories; for he believes that good and evil are mixed in all of us. But he was of a different mind when he wore a white apron, and stood before the printer's case, with its alphabetical compartments full of little metal letters. He boldly launched out then, not in any cockle-shell of rhyme, but in a five-act blank-verse tragedy; and it should be needless to say that the subject was the death of a Roman emperor. Such ventures carry too much sail for their ballast; and, like other lightly laden ships, this has not been heard from since.

The literary ambition was fixed in him while he was very young, and it was stimulated by the scholarly tastes of his father and by his own appetite for reading. In a desultory way he went first to a public and then to a private school. His favorite study was history, and the study he cared least for, and for which he had the least aptitude, was arithmetic. He liked to read aloud, and could do it well. Probably he lost less through the infrequency and irregularity of his attendance than many others would have done, for he was one of the exceptional boys who do more for their education by observation and by reading, than schoolmasters are able to do for them.

His favorite book at this period of his life was Goldsmith's History of Greece, and side by side with it in his estimation were "Don Quixote" and the inexhaustible delights of the "Arabian Nights." The first novel he read was "The Tripplings of Tom Pepper; or, the Effects of Romancing," and the moral it was intended to inculcate struck him so sharply that he entered into a solemn pledge with his brother to avoid prevarication under every circumstance. His admiration for "Don Quixote" was so great that the author of it became his hero, and instead of contenting himself with the romance of the "mad knight" and Sancho Panza, as most readers do, he read besides the other works of the great Spanish author Cervantes, whom he still reckons as a peer of Shakspeare. He was a rather delicate boy, and though he was fond of outdoor sports and games, he was not expert in any one of them.

In 1849 his father sold the "Intelligencer," and moved his family to Dayton, where he purchased another paper, called the "Transcript," which he changed from a semi-weekly to a daily. This movement was not a success, and at the end of two years the failure of it was confessed. All the editor's sons, of whom there were four, could set type, and all of them had helped in producing the paper. After working in the composing-room until eleven at night, the boy we are writing about was often obliged to get up at four to carry the paper and deliver it to subscribers. But the boys took their misfortunes cheerfully, and when the last issue was printed, they all went down to the Miami and had a good swim.

It was then that they took possession of the log cabin, and the year they spent there has been beautifully described by Mr. Howells himself. They did not regret this change from town to country. The father's passionate fondness for nature had been nourished by the English poets, and he had taught his children all that he felt for the woods and fields and open skies. They glazed the narrow windows, relaid the rotten floor, patched the roof, and papered the walls.

"Perhaps it was my father's love of literature which inspired him to choose newspapers for this purpose," says Mr. Howells; "at any rate he did so, and the effect, as I remember it, was not without its decorative qualities. He had used a barrel of papers bought at the nearest post-office, where they had been refused by the persons to whom they had been experimentally sent by the publisher; and the whole first page was taken up by a story which broke off in the middle of a sentence at the foot of the last column, and tantalized us forever with fruitless conjectures as to the fate of the hero and heroine."

It took some days to make the repairs; but when they were completed, the boys laid their mattresses on the sweet, new oak-plank of the floor, and slept hard—in every sense. One night they awoke, and saw their father sitting upright in his bed.

"What are you doing?" they asked.

"Oh, resting!" he answered, jokingly referring to the hardness of his bed.

Their life was full of privations, but it was sweetened by their love of nature and their unfailing good-humor. The boys slept in the loft. "The rude floor rattled and wavered loosely under our tread, and the window in the gable stood open or shut at its own will. There were cracks in the shingle through which we could see the stars, and which, when the first snow came, let the flakes sift in upon the floor. I should not like to step out of bed into a snow-wreath in the morning, now; but then I was glad to do it, and so far from thinking that or any thing in our life a hardship, I counted it all joy.

“Our barrels of paper-covered books were stowed away in the loft, and, overhauling them one day, I found a paper copy of the poems of a certain Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, then wholly unknown to me; and while the old grist-mill, whistling and wheezing to itself, made a vague music in my ears, my soul was filled with this strange, new sweetness. I read ‘The Spanish Student’ there, and ‘Coplas de Manrique,’ and the solemn and ever-beautiful ‘Voices of the Night.’ There were other books in those barrels which I must have read also, but I remember only those that spirited me again to Spain, where I had already been with Irving, and led me to attack seriously the old Spanish grammar, which had been knocking about our house ever since my father bought it from a soldier of the Mexican war. But neither those nor any other books made me discontented with the small-boy’s world around me. They made it a little more populous with visionary shapes, but that was well, and there was room for them all. It was not darkened with cares, and the duties in it were not many."

At the end of a year the foreman of a printing-office in Xenia came to the log cabin, and asked the boy to take the place of a delinquent hand, as he was known to be a good compositor, swift and clean and steady. He tried the job, and gave satisfaction; but time did not cure the homesickness he felt on leaving the simple little cabin in the woods, and he was obliged to return; few as its comforts were, he was held to it by a bond of affection which no offer of worldly prosperity could induce him to break. As long as the family remained there, he staid with them; and when at last they again went to live in the town, he took a place as compositor on the "Ohio State Journal," at a salary of four dollars a week.

For several years after this, his literary ambitions were subordinated to the necessities of mechanical labor as a printer and reporter, but all the time he was equipping himself for a higher and better kind of work ; he added French and Italian to his knowledge of languages, and made the great authors of the world his companions. Then one morning he gathered courage to knock at the door of "The Atlantic Monthly" with a bundle of verses in his hand, and they were so good that the editor accepted and printed them.

His advance was rapid after that, and in time he became the editor of the "Atlantic," a position which he held for nine years. Meanwhile, he was doing original work of his own, and he has earned distinction as a poet, as a writer of plays, and, above all, as a novelist.

Quite recently he went back to the place where the old log cabin had stood, but it was there no more. Thirty years had passed, and all that had happened since seemed so much like a dream, that, when he spoke of his boyhood to a little fellow who followed him, he himself could scarcely believe that what he told was true, and he says that he had a sense of imposing upon his listener.

It must be quite twenty years ago that I read a story called "A Perfect Treasure," as it came out week after week in a certain English magazine. The leading character was a youth with literary aspirations, and it was like reading one's own autobiography to follow his adventures in search of a publisher; the application of his experiences as possibilities to one's self was much more fascinating than the plot.

If my memory is not at fault, a carriage runs away in the story, and the hero stops the horses, an incident which is always turning up, like the proverbial bad sixpence; but in this case the occupant of the carriage does not prove to be a beautiful heiress, nor does she instantly fall in love with her deliverer, as she might be expected to do. It is not a young and lovely person at all, but an old lady whom the hero recognizes as a famous authoress living in the neighborhood; and instead of marrying him and sharing a fortune with him, she only becomes his friend, and helps him to get a start in literature.

Something in the character made me think at the time that it was drawn from life, though the runaway was, of course, an invention; and many years afterward when I met James Payn, the author of the story, he admitted to me that the original was Mary Russell Mitford, who was actually his own literary godmother.

She had been a friend of his father's, and lived at Swallowfield, not far from his own home at Maidenhead, on the Thames; and she was a constant friend to the son, guiding him with advice and criticism, and opening doors for him which less fortunate beginners find closed and barred. A literary godmother is a useful relation, and though she cannot make an author out of a boy who has no gift for literature, her experience and connections enable her to clear the way for one who has ability, and only needs opportunity. Such a boy was James Payn.

She at first tried to dissuade him from making literature a profession, by pointing out its inevitable trials; and, failing in this, she used her influence to advance him in the great world of literature which he was bound to explore. How sound her advice was, he proved by experience, and though he has vindicated the wisdom of his own course, he has re-echoed in his maturity her voice of warning for the benefit of the present generation: —

“There is no pursuit so doubtful, so full of risks, so subject to despondency and disappointments, so open to despair itself,” he says, in one of his books. “Oh, my young friend, with ‘a turn for literature,’ think twice and thrice before committing yourself to it, or you may bitterly regret to find yourself where that ‘turn’ may take you! The literary calling is an exceptional one, and even at the best you will have trials and troubles of which you dream not, and to which no other calling is exposed.”

This is distinctly of a piece with the advice Miss Mitford gave him; but as her admonition did not hold him back, his, I am afraid, will not restrain the ambitious youth who sees more glory in the pen than in the sword or the sceptre.

The letters she wrote to him were recently in my possession, — a bundle of them, tattered and stained, after the hoarding of forty years or more, and written in a small, crabbed, angular hand, which, after filling all sides of the paper with the closest lines, had economized still further by running edgewise along the margin; even the flaps of the envelopes had been utilized for microscopic postscripts. I wish every boy who is thinking of literature as a profession might read them.

“Be careful as to style,” she wrote, in one of them; “give as much character as you can, and as much truth, that being the foundation of all merit in literature and art.” This was after her attempt to dissuade him from entering on a literary career had failed, and previous to it she had endeavored to induce him to devote himself to a business life, and make literature the recreation of his leisure. As an example of what could be done in this direction she pointed out a merchant, whom we may call Mr. A. "If I had fifty sons they should all be in trade," she declared, in another of the letters. "It is the most independent career, the most useful, the most powerful for good, as the press is the most powerful for evil. I wish you knew Mr. A., — his frankness, his cordiality, his cheerfulness, his universal information, his knack of bringing friends together, his perfect high-breeding. If you knew Mr. A. you would see at once that the calling which such a man has followed can have nothing in it that is not honorable. He and James T. Fields, the American bookseller (for these great publishers keep a store), are by far the most princely persons in heart and manner whom I have ever known, and each of them has made his own fortune — the one at five-and-thirty, certainly not more — the other, perhaps, ten years older, — both with hair as glossy and curly as your own, and not a single silver thread among the curls."

Nothing but literature would satisfy his soul, however; he would not stoop to a desk and a ledger, through Mr. A. was willing to give him employment which would have allowed him from five o'clock to ten for his poetic studies, "more by four hours, on an average, than I ever had," that gentleman wrote. But the boy's resolve was inflexible, and authorship in an attic, even with only a crust to eat, seemed better than commerce and affluence.

This was when he was about seventeen or eighteen years old; and it will be interesting now to look back to his earlier years. His family held an excellent social position, and his education was amply provided for. First he was sent to a preparatory school; then to Eton; next to the Military Academy at Woolwich; and finally to Trinity College, Cambridge, from which he was graduated in 1854. He was not a studious boy in the sense of one who rapidly memorizes lessons, and shines at examinations; he had the usual antipathy of persons with a literary bent for mathematics and formulas of all kinds: but he was a diligent reader, and picked up knowledge in the unseen and unconscious ways which are unintelligible and impracticable to closer and more systematic scholars.

He was, no doubt, thought a queer boy by his schoolfellows, but he had one gift that made him popular, as it has done since in a much larger circle. He was a born story-teller, and could weave the most wonderful stories out of his own head. Many a night he was compelled to sit up in bed romancing until one after another the older boys fell asleep.

His school life was unhappy, both at the preparatory school and at Eton. Fagging, or hazing, prevailed at the latter school, and flogging too. The head master was a dandified gentleman, who held the birch with jewelled fingers.

"Please, sir, it's my first fault," the culprit would sometimes plead.

"I think I remember your name before," the pedagogue would reply to this.

"It was my brother, sir."

"Very well, I'll look at my book;" and the boy would shuffle away reprieved.

One boy, seventeen years of age, who was leaving Eton to enter the army, was flogged a few days before his departure. It was a custom then (it may be still) for the boys to present the master with a ten-pound note when they left, dropping it delicately into a jar where he could find it after they had gone. But smarting from his punishment the departing scholar only pretended to drop his ten-pound note into the jar, and chuckled as he pictured to himself the master's fruitless hunt after that precious bit of tissue paper. "I can't flog him for flogging me unjustly," he reflected, "but, dash it, I can fine him."

The boys in the higher classes were fond of snubbing and patronizing those of the lower classes. "Lower Boy, what might be your name?" a diminutive fellow, with a white choker, inquired in a drawling voice of Payn one day.

"Well, it might be Beelzebub, but it isn't," Payn replied; whereupon the "fifth-form" boy attempted to thrash him. "It was the only proper punishment for 'cheek,' no doubt, but I thought it hard that a repartee should be so ill-received," the victim has since said in describing this incident.

Unless a boy had a taste for the classics, Eton in those days did little for him, except in establishing certain moral attributes; and at the end of a year or so Payn, who cared more for Shakspeare than for all the Greeks, went away from the gray old academic buildings with little added to his stock of knowledge. Resolute as he was in his choice of a profession, his relatives still persisted in other plans for him, and they now procured a nomination for him to the Military Academy at Woolwich, which, except that it educates boys for the British army, is identical in its purpose with the academy at West Point.

To prepare him for Woolwich, he was sent to another preparatory establishment, and the system of "cramming" practised here was more hateful to him than any thing at his first school or at Eton. He had long and tedious lessons to learn of which he never knew the meaning, and he recited them as mechanically as a phonograph. The purpose of the school was not to instruct the mind and develop the reason, but to make the pupil seem to be familiar with studies of which he was ignorant. - The master was confident that Payn could pass the ordinary examination, but was afraid he could not stand the physical test, as he was near-sighted.

"The examiners at Woolwich," said the master, "will tell you to look out of the window and describe the colors of the horses on the common. Mind you say 'bay' or 'gray' very rapidly, for all horses are either bay or gray, and if you make a mistake they will not notice it." This illustrates the methods which were followed in all the studies.

The work was so hard and so continuous, that little time was left for reading; but while he was here, Payn had the delight of seeing his compositions published for the first time, though they were not yet printed. He had one schoolfellow named Raymond who could draw, another named Jones who could write like print, and a third named Barker who had a taste for finance. Together they started a weekly paper full of stories and poems, for circulation among their companions. Payn provided the literary part, which Raymond illustrated, and Jones made as many copies as were needed. The circulation of the paper was left to Barker, who fixed the price at sixpence a copy. Their schoolfellows did not appreciate the venture, but Barker was the treasurer of the school, and held in trust for the scholars a certain fund out of which he had to give them two shillings weekly for pocket-money. Seeing that they would not buy the paper willingly, he calmly deducted sixpence from each allowance, and gave a copy of the paper to make up for it. "The 'masses' never know what is good for them," Mr. Payn says, in referring to this, "and our schoolfellows were no exception to the rule; they called Barker a Jew, and, so to speak, 'murmured against Moses.' He was tall and strong, and fought at least half a dozen pitched battles for the maintenance of his object; I think he persuaded himself, like Charles I., that he was really in the right, and set down their opposition to mere 'impatience of taxation,' but in the end they were one too many for him, and, indeed, much more than one. He fell fighting, no doubt, in the sacred cause of literature, but also for his own sixpences, for we — the workers — never saw one penny of them."

Payn succeeded in passing the examination at Woolwich, but he distinguished himself there by his humorous escapades rather than by his scholarship, and before he was seventeen he had to resign on account of illness. His friends then decided that he should enter the Church, and he was sent to a private tutor's to be prepared for the university.

He was more content now, and for the first and only time in his life found pleasure in out-door exercise. "I had some companions of my own age who taught me the use of the leaping-pole. We scoured the country with fourteen-foot poles in our hands, and rarely found brook or lane too broad for us. Many a time, like Commodore Trunion, have I astonished a wagoner by flying from steep bank to bank, over the heads of himself and his horses."

But the pen lost none of its attractions, and verse and prose poured from it. He went through all the agonies of the rejected contributor; time and again he dropped his poems and essays into the post-office, only to receive them back in a month or so with an intimation that they would not do, and the dream of fame faded away in the wintry morning of despair. The sun began to shine by and by, and never did it seem so splendid as the day when it revealed one of his poems printed in a periodical called "Leigh Hunt's Journal." Soon after this he wrote an article on cadet life at Woolwich, which was accepted by "Household Words," the paper edited by Charles Dickens. He thought that his fortune was made now, but there were many disappointments and many set-backs still in store for him. Fame is a coquettish maiden to woo, and pouts as easily as she smiles. The boy with his first article in print thinks he has won her, but, though she stands by his side for a moment, she quickly runs away, and beckons to him from a milestone farther along the road. Payn had to pass many such milestones before he came up with her. Many things he wrote were published, but there was no certain acceptance for his work, and much of it came back. He published two little books of poems, which were civilly treated by the critics; he made the acquaintance of Miss Mitford, who introduced him to Harriet Martineau, and also through the kindness of Miss Mitford he was introduced to De Quincey, the famous essayist and opium-eater. At luncheon with De Quincey, he was asked what wine he would take, and he was about to pour out a glass from the decanter that stood next to him, when De Quincey's daughter whispered, "You must not take that; it is not port wine as you seem to think." It was, in fact, laudanum, the drug to which her father was the most pitiable slave, and he presently helped himself to it as if it had been wine.

A second time Fame seemed to have taken the young author by the hand. The publishers of a periodical placarded a story which they had bought of him, over all the walls of Cambridge, where he was an undergraduate; but he was again mistaken, though, as he says, he was not the first to confuse a placard on the wall with genuine reputation. He had twenty-six articles rejected in one year, and it was fortunate that he was not wholly dependent on his pen for a living. He took his degree at the University, and quickly added to his academic honors those which come by marriage. His earnings for the first year of his married life were thirty-two pounds fifteen shillings, or about one hundred and sixty-three dollars and seventy-five cents. The tide was turning, however, and the next year his income was quadrupled.

Mr. Payn is now the editor of the "Cornhill Magazine," and about a hundred volumes stand to his credit on the shelves of the library of the British Museum. What reader of English fiction is unfamiliar with his stories, in which humor, and wit, and great dramatic power are united? He has gone on improving in his art ever since he sat up in bed inventing stories for his schoolfellows, like a little Scheherezade, and he is now a type of the prosperous literary man ; but he is modest, and it seems to him, no doubt, that he has not yet overtaken Fame, who is still beckoning him another league ahead.

THE life of Whittier may be read in his poems, and by putting a note here and a date there, a full autobiography might be compiled from them. His boyhood and youth are depicted in them with such detail that little need be added to make the story complete; and that little, reverently done as it may be, must seem poor in comparison with the poetic beauty of his own revelations.

What more can we do to show his early home than to quote from his own beautiful poem "Snow-Bound"? There the house is pictured for us, inside and out, with all its furnishings; and those who gathered around its hearth, inmates and visitors, are set before us so clearly that, long after the book has been put away, they remain as distinct in the memory as portraits that are visible day after day on the walls of our homes. He reproduces in his verse the landscapes he saw, the legends of witches and Indians he listened to, the school-fellows he played with, the voices of the woods and fields, and the round of toil and pleasure in a country boy's life. And in other poems his later life, with its impassioned devotion to freedom and its lofty faith, is reflected as lucidly as his youth is in "Snow-Bound" and "The Barefoot Boy."

He himself was "the barefoot boy," and what Robert Burns said of himself Whittier might repeat: "The poetic genius of my country found me, as the prophetic bard Elijah did Elisha, at the plough, and threw her inspired mantle over me."

He was a farmer's son, born at a time when farm-life in New England was more frugal than it is now, and with no other heritage than the good name and example of parents and kinsmen, in whom simple virtues — thrift, industry, and piety — abounded.

His birthplace still stands near Haverhill, Mass., — a house in one of the hollows of the surrounding hills, little altered from what it was in 1807, the year he was born, when it was already at least a century and a half old.

He had no such opportunities for culture as Holmes and Lowell had in their youth. His parents were intelligent and upright people of limited means, who lived in all the simplicity of the Quaker faith, and there was nothing in his early surroundings to encourage and develop a literary taste. Books were scarce, and the twenty volumes on his father's shelves were about Quaker doctrines and Quaker heroes. There was one novel in the house, but it was hidden away, for fiction was forbidden fruit in that household. No library or scholarly companionship was within reach; and if his gift had been less than genius it could never have triumphed over the many disadvantages it had to contend with. Instead of a poet, he would have been a farmer like his forefathers. But literature was a spontaneous impulse with him, as natural as the song of a bird, and he was not wholly dependent on training and opportunity as he would have been had he possessed mere talent.

Frugal from necessity, the life of the Whittiers was not sordid or cheerless to him, moreover, and he looks back to it as tenderly as if it had been full of luxuries. It was sweetened by strong affections, simple tastes, and an unflinching sense of duty, and in all the members of the household the love of nature was so genuine that meadow, wood, and river yielded them all the pleasure they needed, and they scarcely missed the refinements of art.

Surely there could not be a pleasanter or more homelike picture than that which the poet has given us of the family on the night of the great storm when the old house was snow-bound : —

“Shut in from all the world without,
We sat the clean-winged hearth about,
Content to let the north-wind roar
In baffled rage at pane and door,
While the red logs before us beat
The frost-line back with tropic heat ;
And ever, when a louder blast
Shook beam and rafter as it passed,
The merrier up its roaring draught
The great throat of the chimney laughed.

The house-dog on his paws outspread
Laid to the fire his drowsy head ;
The cat's dark silhouette on the wall
A couchant tiger's seemed to fall ;
And, for the winter fireside meet,
Between the andiron's straddling feet,
The mug of cider simmered slow,
The apples sputtered in a row,
And close at hand the basket stood
With nuts from brown October's wood."

The father was a plain, taciturn, yet prompt and decisive man, who in early life had explored the vast wilderness which extended from New Hampshire to Canada ; and sitting before the fire he told of his adventures : —

" Our father rode again his ride
On Memphremagog's wooded side ;
Sat down again to moose and samp
In trapper's hut or Indian camp."

The mother was a woman of gentle ways, much loved and honored in the neighborhood, with a low voice and a benign face.

" Our mother, while she turned her wheel,
Or run the new-knit stocking-heel,

Told how the Indian hordes came down
At midnight on Cocheco town,
And how her own great-uncle bore
His cruel scalp-marks to fourscore,
Recalling in her fitting phrase,
So rich and picturesque and free,
(The common unrhymed poetry
Of simple life and country ways,)
The story of her early days."

Her sister, Mercy Hussey, lived with the family, and, like Mrs. Whittier, wore the gray dress and white cap of the Quakers.

"The sweetest woman ever Fate
Perverse denied a household mate.

Through years of toil and soil and care,
From glossy tress to thin gray hair,
All unprofaned she held apart
The virgin fancies of the heart."

The father's brother, Moses Whittier, also was a member of the family,—"a simple, guileless, childlike man,"—and a great favorite, especially with the boys, as may be supposed from this picture:—

"Our uncle, innocent of books,
Was rich in lore of fields and brooks,
The ancient teachers, never dumb,
Of Nature's unhoused lyceum.

108 BOYHOOD OF LIVING AUTHORS.

In moons and tides and weather wise,
He read the clouds as prophecies,
And foul or fair could well divine,
By many an occult hint or sign,
Holding the cunning-warded keys
To all the woodcraft mysteries.

He told how teal and loon are shot,
And how the eagle's eggs he got,
The feats on pond and river done,
The prodigies of rod and gun ;
Till, warming with the tales he told,
Forgotten was the outside cold,
The bitter wind unheeded blew ;
From ripening corn the pigeons flew,
The partridge drummed i' the wood, the mink
Went fishing down the river-brink ;
In fields with bean or clover gay,
The woodchuck, like a hermit gray,
Peered from the doorway of his cell ;
The muskrat plied the mason's trade,
And tier by tier his mud-walls laid ;
And from the shagbark overhead
The grizzled squirrel dropped his shell."

There were four children, two boys and two girls.

"Our elder sister plied
Her evening task, the stand beside ;
A full, rich nature, free to trust,
Truthful, and almost sternly just,

Impulsive, earnest, prompt to act,
And make her generous thought a fact,
Keeping with many a light disguise
The secret of self-sacrifice.

. . . . .
Upon the motley-braided mat
Our youngest and our dearest sat,
Lifting her large, sweet, asking eyes,
Now bathed within the fadeless green
And holy peace of Paradise."

For a picture of the poet himself, we must turn to the verses on "The Barefoot Boy" in which he says, —

"Oh for boyhood's time of June,
Crowding years in one brief moon,
When all things I heard or saw,
Me, their master, waited for !
I was rich in flowers and trees,
Humming-birds and honey-bees ;
For my sport the squirrel played,
Plied the snouted mole his spade ;
For my taste the blackberry cone
Purpled over hedge and stone ;
Laughed the brook for my delight
Through the day and through the night,
Whispering at the garden wall,
Talked with me from fall to fall ;
Mine the sand-rimmed pickerel pond,
Mine the walnut slopes beyond ;

Mine, on bending orchard trees,
Apples of Hesperides ;
Still, as my horizon grew,
Larger grew my riches too :
All the world I saw or knew
Seemed a complex Chinese toy,
Fashioned for a barefoot boy ! ”

The neighbors were as simple and as frugal as the Whittiers, though some of them were not so intelligent. They still believed in witches ; and one night at a husking, when a big black bug came buzzing into the room, it was declared to be an old woman who was suspected of witchcraft. They struck at it, and knocked it down ; and when on the next day the old woman was found ill in her cottage, they would not believe that the bruises with which she was covered had been received in a fall down stairs as she claimed, and insisted that they were the marks of the blows struck at the bug. Old Captain P——, who lived near her, and had a house and several barns, covered them all over with horse-shoes to keep the witch out.

Their simplicity is shown by still another story. A man was seen looking about in the woods with a gun, and gazing into all the bushes and up into the trees. At first they thought he was a lunatic, and then, deciding that he was a British spy, they had him arrested. The judge examined him and found out that his only business was shooting birds.

"Well," said the judge, "what do you do with them, — eat them?"

"No."

"Do you sell them?"

"No; I study them."

He was a celebrated ornithologist, but the statement that he devoted all his time to studying birds was so incredible that he would have been sent to jail as a spy if he had not been able to prove his truthfulness by a letter from a Boston gentleman, which was in his possession.

There must have been some appeal to the imagination of a poetic youth in this mediæval inexperience, and what charm there was in it Whittier certainly found. It is not his nature to complain, and there is no word of self-pity in all his works to show that he was ever dissatisfied with his condition in boyhood; but one cannot help thinking that the budding poet, with his delicate sensibilities and perceptions, must have pined, now and then, for more books and the conversation of scholars.

I doubt if any boy ever rose to intellectual eminence who had fewer opportunities for education than Whittier. He had no such pasturage to browse on as is open to every reader, who, by simply reaching them out, can lay his hands on the treasures of English literature. He had to borrow books wherever they could be found among the neighbors who were willing to lend, and he thought nothing of walking several miles for one volume. The only instruction he received was at the district school, which was open a few weeks in midwinter, and at the Haverhill Academy, which he attended two terms of six months each, paying for his tuition by work done in his spare hours. A feeble spirit would have languished under such disadvantages, and how he would have bewailed them after outliving them! But Whittier scarcely refers to them, and, instead of begging for pity, he takes them as part of the common lot, and seems to remember only what was beautiful and good.

Occasionally a stranger knocked at the door of the old homestead in the valley. Sometimes it was a distinguished Quaker from abroad, but oftener it was a pedler, or some vagabond begging for food, which was seldom refused. Once a foreigner came, and asked for lodgings for the night, — a dark, repulsive man, whose appearance was so much against him that Mrs. Whittier was afraid to admit him. No sooner had she sent him away, however, than she repented. "What if a son of mine were in a strange land!" she thought. The young poet (who was not recognized as such) offered to go out in search of him, and he presently returned with him, having found him standing in the roadway just as he had been turned away from another house.

"He took his seat with us at the supper table," says Whittier, in one of his prose sketches, "and when we were all gathered around the hearth that cold autumnal evening, he told us, partly by words, partly by gestures, the story of his life and misfortunes, amused us with descriptions of the grape-gatherings and festivals of his sunny clime, edified my mother with a receipt for making bread of chestnuts, and in the morning, when, after breakfast, his dark, sullen face lighted up, and his fierce eye moistened with grateful emotion as, in his own silvery Tuscan accent, he poured out his thanks, we marvelled at the fears which had so nearly closed our doors against him, and, as he departed, we all felt that he had left with us the blessing of the poor."

This reads like a passage from the "Vicar of Wakefield," and we are reminded of the same book by the poet's description of Jonathan Plummer, "maker of verses, pedler and poet, physician and parson," who came twice a year to the Whittier homestead. "He brought with him pins, needles, tape, and cotton thread for my mother; jack-knives, razors, and soap for my father; and verses of his own composing, coarsely printed, and illustrated with rude woodcuts, for the delectation of the younger branches of the family. No love-sick youth could drown himself, no deserted maiden bewail the moon, no rogue mount the gallows, without fitting memorial in Plummer's verses. Earthquakes, fires, and shipwrecks he regarded as personal favors from Providence, furnishing the raw material of song and ballad. Welcome to us in our country seclusion, as Autolycus to the clown in 'A Winter's Tale,' we listened with infinite satisfaction to his readings of his own verses or to his ready improvisation upon some dramatic incident or topic suggested by his auditors. . . . He was scrupulously conscientious, devout, inclined to theological disquisitions, and withal mighty in Scripture. He was thoroughly independent, flattered nobody, cared for nobody, trusted nobody. When invited to sit down at our dinner-table, he invariably took the precaution to place his basket of valuables between his legs for safe-keeping. 'Never mind thy basket, Jonathan,' said my father, 'we sha'n't steal thy verses.' — 'I'm not sure of that,' returned the suspicious guest; 'it is written, "Trust ye not in any brother."'"

Another guest came to the house one day. It was a vagrant old Scotchman, who, when he had been treated to bread and cheese and cider, sang some of the songs of Robert Burns, which Whittier then heard for the first time, and which he never forgot. Coming to him thus, as songs reached the people before printing was invented, through gleemen and minstrels, their sweetness lingered in his ears, and he soon found himself singing in the same strain. Some of his earliest inspiration was drawn from Burns, and he tells us of his joy, when, one day after the visit of the old Scotchman, his schoolmaster loaned him a copy of that poet's works. "I began to make rhymes myself, and to imagine stories and adventures," he says in his simple way.

Indeed, he began to rhyme almost as soon as he had learned to read, and he kept his gift a secret from all except his oldest sister, fearing that his father, who was a prosaic man, would think that he was wasting his time. He wrote under the fences, in the attic, in the barn,—wherever he could escape observation ; and, as pen and ink were not always available, he sometimes used chalk, and even charcoal. Great was the surprise of the family when some of his verses were unearthed — literally unearthed — from under a heap of rubbish in a garret. But his father frowned upon these evidences of the bent of his mind, not out of unkindness, but because he doubted the sufficiency of the boy's education for a literary life, and did not wish to inspire him with hopes which might never be fulfilled.

His sister had faith in him, nevertheless, and without his knowledge she sent one of his poems to the editor of the "Free Press," a newspaper published in Newburyport. Whittier was helping his father to repair a stone wall by the roadside, when the carrier flung a copy of the paper to him, and, unconscious that any thing of his own was in it, he opened it, and glanced up and down the columns. His eyes fell on some verses called "The Exile's Departure : " —

"Fond scenes which delighted my youthful existence,
With feelings of sorrow I bid ye adieu, —
A lasting adieu, for now, dim in the distance,
The shores of Hibernia recede from my view.

Farewell to the cliffs, tempest-beaten and gray,
 Which guard the loved shores of my own native land !
 Farewell to the village and sail-shadowed bay,
 The forest-crowned hill, and the water-washed strand !"

His eyes swam. It was his own poem,
 — the first he ever had in print.

"What is the matter with thee?" his father demanded, seeing how dazed he was ; but, though he resumed his work on the wall, he could not speak, and he had to steal a glance at the paper again and again before he could convince himself that he was not dreaming.

Sure enough, the poem was there with his initial at the foot of it, "W., Haverhill, June 1, 1826 ;" and, better still, this editorial notice : " If 'W.,' at Haverhill, will continue to favor us with pieces, beautiful as the one inserted in our poetical department of to-day, we shall esteem it a favor."

The editor thought so much of "The Exile's Departure" and some other verses which followed it from the same hand, that he resolved to make the acquaintance of his new contributor, and he drove over to see him. Whittier, then a boy of eighteen, was summoned from the fields where he was working, clad only in shirt, trousers, and straw hat; and having slipped in at the back door, so that he might put his shoes and coat on, came into the room with "shrinking diffidence, almost unable to speak, and blushing like a maiden." The editor was a young man, not more than twenty-two or twenty-three, and the friendship that began with this visit lasted until death ended it. How strong and close it was, and how it was made to serve the cause of freedom, may be learned in the life of the great abolitionist, William Lloyd Garrison, for that was the editor's name.

The poet's corner of the newspaper did not prove to be the temple of fame which Whittier imagined it to be when the "Free Press" was dropped into his hands with his poem in it, and he still had an up-hill path before him. But he was not consumed with the desire for the glitter and noise which satisfy some ambitions, and he lost thought of himself in the great struggle for the emancipation of the negro which he joined with his friend Garrison. Fame never passes true genius by, however, and when it came it brought with it the love and reverence of thousands who recognize in Whittier a nature abounding in patience, unselfishness, and all the sweetness of Christian charity.

MR. STOCKTON may be said to have been half a city boy and half a country boy, for his early years were divided between a life in town and a life in the country. He was born in Philadelphia, on April 5, 1834, and was one of twelve children, three of whom were by his father's first wife, and nine by a second wife. Six of the latter children survived to an adult age, and of these Frank was the first-born. His full name is Francis Richard Stockton, and he owes this, he tells us, to the romantic tastes of one of his half-sisters, who insisted on his being called Francis after the first King of France, who bore that name, and Richard after Richard the Lion-hearted, King of England.

When he was ten years old, his family moved from Philadelphia to a farmhouse in Bucks County, Penn., and, as no school was within reach, he and his brothers were allowed to run wild, and to amuse themselves in the various ways that were sure to occur to high-spirited and healthy boys when left to their own resources.

Nothing that Mr. Stockton has written is more amusing than the story of his own boyhood, as I have had the privilege of hearing him tell it.

The house in Bucks County was one of the most fascinating places in the world for a boy. It was near the woods, where game could be found; neighbors were few and far between; and about a mile away there was a wild tract called Green Swamp, to which all sorts of awe-inspiring legends attached. It was said to be impenetrable to man, though haunted by strange beasts; and in the middle of it was a upas-tree, which, like that of the fable, stifled all things that came near it. The rumored impenetrability of the swamp, and the legend of the upas, made it all the more inviting to the boys, of course, and they attempted again and again to explore it. The water and bog were dotted with hummocks of solid land, like plums in a pudding, and they had to leap from one to the other of these. Sometimes they slipped, and got soaked in the ooze, but they were never able to get very far, and whether the upas is there or not is still a mystery.

Somewhere under the roof of the house there was an apartment which was called the gun-room, — probably to distinguish it from the other rooms, rather than from its use as the family arsenal. Exploring this, one day, Francis the First and Richard the Lion-hearted, united in the small and mischievous person commonly called Frank, found an old gun without a lock, which had been condemned as useless. The idea of condemning a gun merely because it had no lock, struck him as a piece of folly; it was easy to repair so slight a defect as that. So he loaded the gun, and took it out with him into the garden, carrying an ordinary hammer with him as he went. He put a percussion-cap on the nipple, and having rested his weapon on the frame of a hot-bed in the garden, — for it was a heavy old blunderbuss, — he took aim at a neighbor's chickens, and then struck the cap with the hammer in his hand. The gun went off, and three of the chickens fell. For a moment his experiment seemed to have been an unqualified success, but there was a stinging sensation near his eye. The cap had flown off the nipple, and struck him, and he nearly lost his sight. This was one of the many lessons he had, that it is not wise to assume that one's elders are all fools.

The boys slept in a great, old-fashioned, four-post bed, and one night they turned it over, and climbed up into the high platform which it made when inverted. They were within a few inches of the ceiling, and they proposed to sleep in this way; but their mother was brought to the scene by the noise they had made, and they had to replace the bed in its proper position.

They told stories after they went to bed, Frank and his brother John collaborating for the amusement of their younger brother William, who lay at the foot of the bed. Frank would start the story, and at the point where he left off, John would take it up, depending on his own imagination for the continuation. The end was often very different from what the beginner had intended it to be ; but the uncertainty of the development quickened the interest, both for the narrator and the listener, who, if he dared to go to sleep during the story, was immediately kicked out of bed.

Frank was small, and rather slight of figure, but he was as athletic as the rest. They were all good riders and swimmers, and were fond of gardening and carpentry. Their knack in the latter was remarkable. They used the full-sized tools of a working carpenter, and built houses which, though not fitted for human occupation, would have been too large for any doll but one of extravagant tastes.

At the end of three years their parents decided that the untrammelled life the boys were leading would not do any longer, and they returned to Philadelphia. Frank had already been in a private school, and he was now sent to a public school, from which he passed into the Central High School. He was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

He was not an ambitious boy, but a clever one, and it was easy for him to stand second in his class. His natural bent was in the direction of literature, and he was not more than ten years old when he began to write verses. On one occasion he sent a poem to a religious paper published in Baltimore, and when it was returned to him he made up his mind that the editor was an ignorant person, who could not appreciate a good thing, and who would have rejected the works of Shakspeare and Milton had they been offered to him. To prove this point, he copied out one of Milton's devotional poems, and, having attached a fictitious name to it, he sent it to the same editor. He was chagrined to find, however, that the editor at once recognized its merits and printed it, though he, this arbiter of the destiny of literary aspirants, did not detect the fictitious character of the alleged author.

The restraints of the city did not curb the frolicsome propensities of Frank and his brothers. Their father was a devout man, who frequently entertained the ministers of his denomination; and one day, when some of these gentlemen were guests at dinner, it was noticed with surprise that all the boys refused mince-pie. They seemed to be choking, and rushed away from the table when it was offered to them. The pie had been made the evening before, and during the night the boys had stolen into the pantry, and substituted mush for the mince-meat. They had many a clandestine supper in their night-dresses, and used to slide down the banisters, because, as one of their number impressed upon them (very likely it was Frank), the cracking of their knees would perhaps have awakened the household.

They had a secret society, and when a candidate presented himself for admission, this question was asked him: "If your mother was being chased by an Indian who wanted to tomahawk her, and she hid herself in some place that you knew of, what would you say to the Indian if he asked you where she was?" If the candidate admitted that he would deceive the Indian under such circumstances as these, he was considered worthy of admission, but if he said his adherence to truth would compel him to sacrifice his mother to the savage, he was rejected.

They also belonged to another society, the Crazy Club, of which Frank was the chief officer, his title being the Grand Worthy Maniac. The meetings of the club were held in boats on the river, and the Grand Worthy Maniac exercised a despotic authority over the members. They were required to obey his mandates implicitly, and he would sometimes order one of them to take off his clothes, and swim, on a moonlight night, into the middle of the stream, and sing comic songs while floating there.

Once they ventured to play at pirates, and rowed out in chase of another boat which some boys were pulling. The latter did not seem in the least alarmed, nor did they make any attempt to avoid capture. When they were overtaken, the pirate chief demanded, "What do you mean by coming out on this river?" But they made no answer, and showed no intention of resistance. This nonplussed the pursuers, who had imagined that there would be a hand-to-hand combat, in which they would be the victors. "What do you mean?" they repeated. Still the other boys had nothing to say; and instead of making them walk the plank as they had intended, the pirates rowed off very quietly, saying, "Now, never do it again, that's all." Piracy did not seem to be as exciting as some stories made it appear.

Behind all this nonsense and mischief there was plenty of hard work and solid reading. Frank was graduated from the Central High School when he was eighteen years old, and was intended to be a physician; but, for some unexplained reason, he took up the art of wood-engraving. His ambition was to be an author, and he gave his leisure to writing articles and stories, many of which were accepted and printed while he was still a boy. Then he gave up wood-engraving altogether, and entered on a journalistic career, which, when "St. Nicholas" was started, in 1873, led him into the position of assistant editor of that attractive magazine, under the editorship of Mrs. Mary Mapes Dodge. Long before this he had made a reputation as a humorous and fanciful writer, but it was not until he was forty years old, or more, that he made his greatest hit with the Rudder Grange stories, in which the rare quality of his genius was first discovered. Thirteen years have gone by, each year bringing him some new honor, and he does not look a day older now than he did then. He still looks like a man of thirty-five, and he may be considered an instance of what he terms "protracted youth."

SOME time ago at a dinner-party of Americans in Paris the conversation turned on the comparative merits of the various transatlantic steamers.

"Which steamer did you come by?" one of the guests asked a tall, dark-complexioned man, who sat next to him.

"Oh, I didn't come by steamer. I came from America by land!" was the reply.

The speaker was Col. Thomas Wallace Knox, the celebrated traveller and special correspondent, who had recently arrived in Paris from the United States by the way of Kamschatka, Siberia, the Amoor River, Mongolia, Chinese Tartary, and Russia. He had scored three thousand five hundred miles in sledges and fifteen hundred in carriages of various kinds.

Since then Col. Knox has written several delightful books of travel and adventure for young people ; and the readers of these volumes may be glad to learn something about the boyhood of the author, though they will not find any thing very thrilling in it, or, indeed, any thing beyond the usual happenings in the life of a farmer's boy.

He was born in Pembroke, N.H., on June 26, 1835 ; and when he was only four years old his father died, followed by his mother ten months later. After this calamity he continued to live with relatives in New Hampshire for a few months, and then he was sent to an uncle in Boston, where he attended the Mayhew School. Already he had a passion for travel, and his favorite study was geography ; he was the foremost pupil in that, and, though he was sometimes at fault in mathematics and grammar, he was always perfect in his geography lessons. In reading, too, his greatest thirst, like that of most boys, was for travel and adventure, and he could never get enough of them ; though he also read history, biography, and science — every thing, indeed, that he could lay hands on.

"When I was nine years old," he tells us, "I read Kendall's 'Santa Fé Expedition,' which had just appeared, and I think it was the first 'adult' book that I cared for. I had already gone through Robinson Crusoe and many of the Peter Parley volumes, and I knew them almost by heart. In my uncle's house in Boston there was a fair supply of books; but when at the age of ten I went to live in the country again, I found a scarcity. I borrowed of everybody who would lend me; and, as I had a habit of rapid reading, I made a reputation for the promptitude with which I returned the volumes that had been loaned to me. Among the books that I greatly enjoyed at that time were 'The Adventures of Captain Riley on the Coast of Africa,' 'Shipwrecks and Disasters at Sea,' Drake's 'Book of the Indians,' Millard's 'Travels in Egypt, Arabia, and the Holy Land,' Irving's 'Astoria,' 'Alhambra,' and 'The Adventures of Captain Bonneville,' Foxe's 'Book of Martyrs,' a History of the Revolutionary War, Stephens's 'Travels in Yucatan,' at least half a dozen of Scott's novels, and as many of Cooper's. Nothing came amiss, but travel and adventures held the first place and history the second."

When he was ten years old he went back to New Hampshire, and for the next six years he worked as a farmer's boy, attending the district school for ten or twelve weeks in the winter. He did all the "chores," — milked cows, fed horses, cows, sheep, and pigs, brought wood for the household fires, and made himself useful in every possible way. This was in winter; and in summer he had the same sort of occupation, though instead of going to school he worked all day long in the fields, ploughing, planting, hoeing, and harvesting.

Many successful men look back to early experiences of this kind with nothing but fondness. But Thomas Knox had no taste for farm life. His heart was with Stephens in Yucatan, with Riley on the coast of Africa, and with Captain Bonneville among the buffaloes and Indians on the plains. Strange to say, his aversion to agricultural pursuits is as intense now as it was then.

"Friends of my later life," he has told the author of this sketch, "have often wondered why I dislike the country, and can never be induced to go there. To this day the sight of a field of corn, potatoes, hay, or oats, recalls the memories of my boyhood struggles for existence, and gives me any thing but a pleasant feeling. Should I live to be a centenarian I am sure I would never be willing to reside in the country, or even to go there for more than a few days at a time."

The spirit of adventure brings many boys to grief; it leads them to abandon comfortable homes in search of excitement and fortune, and often enough they return crestfallen and penniless. Thomas Knox had the true fibre of the born traveller, however, and lived to verify the experiences of the favorite authors of his boyhood.

Reading as much as he did, it was natural that he should think of writing himself, and while he was still a farmer's boy his name appeared for the first time as that of an author in the columns of a country newspaper. This was in his sixteenth year, and, when he was seventeen he left the farm and went to earning his living as a shoemaker. He saved money out of his wages, and attended school; and he became so proficient in penmanship that he put down the awl and the last, and set himself up as a teacher of that art. He also taught in a district school, and when he was twenty-three he secured the position of principal of an academy in Kingston, N.H.

His boyhood had ended by this time, of course; but it may be interesting for us to go a step farther, and trace his career up to the time that he became a successful author. Giving up his school two years after he took it, he went to Colorado to dig for gold; but, as one of his biographers says, "To dig for gold is an easy phrase, but very disappointing work. First, you must dig where the gold is; then you must dig until you get to the gold; and, finally, you must know how to dispose of the precious metal." He soon grew tired of the uncertainty of gold-digging; and, be-believing that the pen would be mightier than the pickaxe, he went to Denver, and obtained a position as reporter on the "Daily News." Journalism proved to be the most congenial occupation he had yet tried; and when the civil war broke out, he went into the field as special correspondent of the New-York "Herald," and wrote graphic descriptions from the seat of war. Afterward the same paper sent him out to accompany an expedition designed to lay a telegraph-line through Northern Asia, and it was by this route that he reached Paris without having used a transatlantic steamer.

THE boyhood of Edward Everett Hale reads like a chapter in one of his own stories of home life. There was nothing miraculous or romantic in it; no prodigious feats of learning, no martyrdom, and no canonization of saints.

His father and mother were just the kind of people that he holds up to admiration in his books, — full of good sense, liberality, and originality; controlling their children with a secure hand, but directing instead of driving them, and reasoning with them instead of scolding. Piety in that household never wore a long face; benevolence worked in deeds and not in words.

At the end of his first month in the Boston Latin School, the boy came home with a report which showed that he was ninth in a class of fifteen; and he dreaded handing it to his mother, as he thought she would be displeased to find him so low in the class. "Oh," she said, "that is no matter. Probably the other boys are brighter than you. God made them so, and you cannot help that. But the report says that you are among the boys who behave well. That you can see to, and that is all I care about."

This little incident shows the reasonableness which guided the conduct of the Hale household. A boy was expected to do all in his power, but no more; and if he could not do it one way, he was allowed to attempt it by some new method, which often proved to be no less successful on account of its novelty. He was not forced to conform to patterns, simply because they fitted other boys, though there was no lack of discipline and no toleration of the wilful misuse of time. The motto that has since become famous was so closely lived up to, that it might have been as unceasingly in the ears of the family as the ticking of the clock: —

"Look up, and not down;
Look forward, and not back;
Look out, and not in;
Lend a hand."

The boy who was born in Boston on April 3, 1822, came of a stock which justified the expectation of a brilliant and useful career for him. His grand-uncle was Nathan Hale, who, when he was led out to execution as a spy in the Revolutionary war, said with his last breath, "I regret that I have only one life to surrender for my country;" and his uncle on his mother's side was Edward Everett the orator, after whom he was named. His father was a man who combined scholarship with activity in public affairs, and it was through his advocacy that the first steam railway was built in Massachusetts.

Great are the changes that have taken place in Boston since then. The boy is a man, and looking back says, "I have sailed my bark boat on the salt waters, where I now can sit in the parlors of my parishioners. I have studied botany on the marshes, where I now sit in my own study to prepare the notes which I read to you. I rode in triumph on the locomotive which hissed over the first five miles that were ready of that highway to the West, where now she might run five thousand."

A good half of Boston is built on land recovered from the sea; and there are solid streets and houses where, less than half a century ago, the water flowed, sinking and rising with the tides.

He was sent to a dame-school while he was still an infant; but he learned little there, and probably was not expected to learn. As the children droned through their lessons, he sat quietly watching the motes of dust dancing in the sunbeams that streamed through the blinds, and his greatest interest was in the making of sand-pies on the floor. When he was placed in a big yellow chair in the middle of the room, he could not be made to understand that it was for some misconduct.

Then he was sent to a school kept by a man who was amiable but incompetent, and he gathered scarcely more here than he did in watching the sunbeams. "A feather-pillow sort of a man was 'Simple' the master, — a good-natured, innocent fellow, who would neither set the bay on fire nor want to, who could and would keep us out of mischief for five or six hours a day, and would never send us home mad with rage, or injustice, or ambition."

He was sometimes late in coming to school; and in order to reproach him, Edward Everett Hale, then a small and audacious lad, marshalled all the boys in their seats, and had a class out to recite before he arrived.

This saucy boy had strong opinions on many subjects at this early age, and he put little value on schools and schoolmasters. But he was a great reader, and his reading fertilized his mind as a field is fertilized before the sower scatters the seed.

Grimm's "Fairy Stories" opened the world of magic to him; and the poems of Sir Walter Scott had such a fascination for him, that there never was a time after he had read them, when he could not quote long passages from memory. As with all imaginative boys, a book of travels transported him to the very spot described; and as he read an account of the Arctic regions, the house melted into air, and he seemed to be sitting in the cabin of an ice-bound ship, held fast in the jaws of the polar sea, with the aurora flashing up and down the sky. Happy is the boy whose imagination has such a spread of wing that he can leave every care on earth behind, and forget himself in a book ! Life has no greater boon than this, and it is the special gift of youth which age can seldom claim.

When he was nine years of age he was sent to the Boston Latin School, where Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Edward Everett, and Charles Sumner had bēen educated. It is the oldest school in America, and one of the best ; and in it the subject of our sketch made substantial progress, though he seldom stood higher than ninth in a class of fifteen. Unlike most budding authors, he was fond of arithmetic ; and another peculiarity of his was, that he could not for the life of him see why his opinions on matters of education were not regarded with as much consideration as the master's. " I had a very decided feeling that it was as fitting that he should consult me as I him," he says with charming frankness.

All the while he was reading diligently; and two summers he was taken out of school to read at home, an excellent plan when a boy is growing fast, though it would be a pity if he should miss the hardening and sharpening which come from association with other boys.

Another privilege he had which any boy who aspires to become an author or a journalist might well envy. Who that is stirred with such an ambition has not looked up with awe and longing, to the front of a great newspaper-office, wishing that he might be admitted to its secrets, its labors, and its honors? Nothing in the world has seemed so glorious, not even the Capitol, pillars, steps, dome, and all, as a newspaper-building in some by-street of the city, with its lights shining in the upper story where the compositors are setting type, the presses rattling in the basement, and the entrance with editors, reporters, and messengers coming and going at all hours of the day and night.

Well, the father of Edward Everett Hale was the editor of the Boston "Advertiser," and the offices of that paper resembled a nursery to his son, who, like William Dean Howells, learned to set type almost as soon as he had learned to read. He not only mastered the mechanical parts of the business of making a newspaper, but wrote articles for the "Advertiser" while he was still a boy, and he translated an article from a French paper for it before he was eleven: a good beginning for one who in after-life was to fill in turn every position, from that of a reporter, to the much loftier perch of the controlling editor.

In 1835 he entered Harvard University, where Lowell was already a student; and his literary tastes were fostered there by Edward Tyrrel Channing, the professor of English language and literature, who also taught Dana, Story, Holmes, Parkman, and many others who have since made their mark in authorship. Longfellow was another of the professors. "He came to Cambridge in our first years. He was not so much older than we as to be distant, was always accessible, friendly, and sympathetic. All poor teachers let the book come between them and the pupil. Great teachers never do: Longfellow never did. We used to call him 'Head,' which meant head of the modern language department."

Hale was graduated in 1839, and about that time he made the acquaintance of two new authors through their books. One was Alfred Tennyson, and the other John Ruskin. The first copy of Tennyson that fell into his hands had been brought from England by Emerson, who was always kind to young people, and lent his books freely. Then Ruskin appeared, and his writings developed the love of the beautiful in the young student, and gave him the habit of a close observation of nature out of doors. Scarcely any thing in the shape of a book was uninteresting or unprofitable to him; but he confesses that he could not enjoy Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding," and that he went to sleep over it.

After his graduation, he taught Latin and Greek for two years, and at the same time wrote articles and stories for the papers. He is as widely known now as an author as he is as a preacher; but when he was twenty-four he entered the Christian ministry, and he has never given it up. The best of his endeavors have been devoted to it, and in his life he has been governed by a principle which he uttered before a college society, — “We professional men must serve the world, not, like the handicraftsman, for a price accurately representing the work done; but as those who deal with infinite values, and confer benefits as freely and nobly as Nature.”

SOME winter's evening, when the reader of this is in a mood to beguile himself with a pleasant book of essays, I would advise him to take down from the shelf the "Fire-side Travels" of James Russell Lowell, in which he will find among other good things a picturesque account of Cambridge as it was in the poet's boyhood. "Cambridge Thirty Years Ago" he calls it, but the time he describes has crept back twenty years more since it was written, and to us it is a picture, not of thirty years, but of half a century, ago.

Cambridge was not the noisy and populous place then that it is now. It was not linked to Boston by the endless chain of horse-cars which are running to and fro night and day. It was a quiet country village, resembling the country villages of England, and resting in the shade of widebranched, thick-leaved elms, lindens, and horse-chestnuts. The Revolution was as fresh in the public mind as the Civil War is to-day; and the recent presence of the British soldiers could be traced in the hooks from which they had hung their hammocks, and in the dents made by their muskets on the floor of the minister's library in the old gambrel-roofed house where the picture of a lady was shown with a slit in the canvas, which a red-coat had made with a thrust of his rapier.

People were still living who remained loyal to King George; and women still washed clothes in the town spring. One coach carried all the passengers there were between the village and Boston. A youth named Oliver Wendell Holmes, who had just gone forth from the gambrel-roofed house to study medicine in the schools of Paris, was spoken of as a sprightly versifier, who might make his mark in literature if he chose. The poetical accomplishments of another young man named Longfellow had been heard of in the community, though he had not yet been invited to take a professorship in the college as he was a few years later. Ralph Waldo Emerson was preaching in Boston, and John Greenleaf Whittier, a young Quaker of Haverhill, was filling an editor's chair, and sending out verses that thrilled with the promise of genuine lyric feeling.

Though he was destined to become their intimate in after-years, Lowell knew none of these at this time. They had all begun the battle of life, while he was still a schoolboy, with his hands in his pockets, and his eyes open to all the sights of the little world around him.

"Everybody knew everybody, and all about everybody," he says in "Fireside Travels;" "and village wit, whose high 'change was around the little market-house in the town square, had labelled every more marked individuality with nicknames that clung like burs." There was the village whitewasher, all of whose belongings emblemized his trade. He whitewashed his trees, and grew the whitest of china asters in his garden. He wore a white neckcloth; and kept white fowls, white ducks, and white geese. There was an old Scotch gardener who told romantic stories, and showed an imaginary French bullet, sometimes in one leg, sometimes in the other, and sometimes toward nightfall in both. One of the two grocers was a deacon, upon whom the boys were fond of playing a familiar joke.

One of them would enter the shop, and ask, "Have you any sour apples, deacon?"

"Well, no, I haven't any just now that are exactly sour; but there's the bell-flower apple, and folks that like a sour apple generally like that."

Another boy would then come in, and say, "Have you any sweet apples, deacon?"

"Well, no," the deacon would reply, "I haven't any just now that are exactly sweet; but there's the bell-flower apple, and folks that like a sweet apple generally like that."

Thus it was that the deacon's apples were suited to the customer's taste, whether he wanted them sour or sweet.

The barber's shop was a sort of museum, and no boy ever went there to have his hair cut that he was not accompanied by troops of friends, who thus inspected the curiosities gratis.

“What a charming place it was, how full of wonder and delight!” says Lowell in the essay already quoted. “The sunny little room, fronting south-west upon the common, rang with canaries and Java sparrows, nor were the familiar notes of robin, thrush, and bobolink wanting; and a large white cockatoo harangued vaguely at intervals, in what we believed on R., the barber’s, authority to be the Hottentot language. . . . The walls were covered with curious old Dutch prints, beaks of albatross and penguin, and whales’ teeth fantastically engraved. There was Frederick the Great, with head drooped plottingly, and keen sidelong glance from under the three-cornered hat. There hung Bonaparte, too, the long-haired, haggard general of Italy, his eyes sombre with prefigured destiny; and there was his silent grave, — the dream and the fulfilment. Good store of sea-fights there was also; above all, Paul Jones in the ‘Bonhomme Richard,’ the smoke rolling courteously to leeward, that we might see him dealing thunderous work to the two hostile vessels, each twice as large as his own, and the reality of the scene corroborated by streaks of red paint leaping from the mouth of every gun. Suspended over the fireplace, with the curling-tongs, were an Indian bow and arrows; and in the corners of the room stood New Zealand paddles and war-clubs, quaintly carved. The model of a ship in glass we variously estimated to be worth from a hundred to a thousand dollars—the barber rather favoring the higher valuation, though never distinctly committing himself. Among these wonders, the only suspicious one was an Indian tomahawk, which had too much the peaceful look of a shingling-hatchet. Did any rarity enter the town, it gravitated naturally to these walls, to the very nail that waited to receive it, and where, the day after its accession, it seemed to have hung a lifetime."

Lowell's home was at Elmwood, about a mile away from Harvard Square, and it was in this roomy mansion that he was born on Feb. 22, 1819. His father was a Unitarian clergyman, and he was descended from a long line of prosperous people who had originally come to America from Bristol, Eng. The city of Lowell was named after one of them, and another was the founder of the Lowell Institute in Boston, an educational establishment to which he left two hundred and fifty thousand dollars by a will written while he was on the summit of the Great Pyramid.

The house is still screened from the highway by the giant trees around it, though the jingle of the horse-cars and the rumble of passing carriages and carts now jar upon its quiet; but when the poet was a boy it was in a solitude, and the only noises were the cries of the birds which thronged the garden.

He was fond of birds, as the reader can well believe who knows an essay of his called "My Garden Acquaintance;" and the feathered visitors who came to Elmwood and gossiped in its cavernous shade were always treated as welcome guests. There were robins, catbirds, blue-jays, orioles, bobolinks, blackbirds, and herons. What could be better than Lowell's description of the robins?

"They are feathered Pecksniffs, to be sure; but then how brightly their breasts, that look rather shabby in the sunlight, shine in a rainy day against the dark green of the fringe-tree! After they have pinched and shaken all the life out of an earth-worm, as Italian cooks pound all the spirit out of a steak, and then gulped him, they stand up in honest self-confidence, expand their red waistcoats with the virtuous air of a lobby member, and outface you with an eye that calmly challenges inquiry. 'Do I look like a bird that knows the flavor of raw vermin? I throw myself upon a jury of my peers. Ask any robin if he ever ate any thing less ascetic than the frugal berry of the juniper, and he will answer that his vow forbids him!' Can such an open bosom cover such depravity? Alas, yes! I have no doubt his breast was redder at that very moment with the blood of my raspberries. On the whole, he is a doubtful friend in the garden. He makes his dessert of all kinds of berries, and is not averse from early pears. But when we remember how omnivorous he is, eating his own weight in an incredibly short time, and that Nature seems exhaustless in her inventions of new insects hostile to vegetation, perhaps we may reckon that he does more good than harm. For my own part, I would rather have his cheerfulness and kind neighborhood than many berries."

The birds returned the friendship of the inmates of the house with unwonted confidence, and would sometimes fly through the hall or the library. But, though the boy had so much interest in them, he never "oologized" them, and if they would not come near for him to observe them, he brought them closer with an opera-glass — a much better weapon, as he says, than a gun.

No school can ever do as much for a sensitive boy as the influence and example of parents of scholarly tastes, with whom the habit of reading is as regular as eating or sleeping. Lowell's father was a scholar, and his mother, as well, was a person of liberal culture and literary capacity, who, as soon as her children could read, opened to them the treasures of English literature, —

“The old melodious lays
Which softly melt the ages through,
The songs of Spenser's golden days,
Arcadian Sidney's silvery phrase.”

Chaucer, Shakspeare, and Milton were familiar to them at an age when most children are still reciting nursery rhymes; and in James Russell Lowell, who was the youngest of them, the influence of these masters struck with deeper roots than in the others, bringing forth in good time a fruit of its own.

Elmwood was full of books, and they were not allowed to lie dusty and unused on the shelves. Access to them under the direction of as discriminating a student as Mrs. Lowell was in itself an education; but it was not deemed to be enough, and the young poet was sent to a classical school in the neighborhood, where he was prepared for Harvard College.

What sort of a boy was he at this time? A letter from one of his classmates, the Hon. G. B. Loring, lies open before the writer of these lines: "He was a rapid reader, and had a keen appreciation of all noble thoughts, and a deep sympathy with all noble characters. He learned his lessons with great ease, but was not fond of mathematics, though he comprehended readily philosophical theories. He loved poetry, and his own faculty of versification was notable even then. He had decided political views, and was a Whig in those days of Whiggery and Democracy, because he thought the latter a pretence, and not the embodiment of doctrines accordant with the name. He was by nature devout and conservative in his religious views, and he was an advocate of temperance obligations as a safeguard against temptation. Perhaps he did not set an example of intense application, but he acquired knowledge more easily than many of his fellows. His wit flashed about in a way which sometimes startled the dull, and always whetted the edge of the bright; but he was a boy without malice, and with strong attachments, a dutiful son, and a devoted friend. His tastes were simple, and free from all desire for display. Although at times subject to those moods which fall upon boys as well as men who have sensitive natures, he struggled alone through his cloudy hours, and gave only his sunshine to his friends."

He was a brilliant letter-writer, and his private correspondence was sprinkled with verses, many of which have never been published. Mr. Loring has a bundle of such letters from him, in which prose is often dropped for a cantering rhyme. In one, describing an early trip to the White Mountains, he writes:—

"I suppose you remember when Time was young ;
Say ! What made him so crabbed and cross ?
Did he speculate largely in Eastern lands,
Which the deluge made all a dead loss ?
Did he lose his affianced (poor soul) in the flood ?
Or write a small poem or two,
And turn misanthropic on reading a squib
In some acid pre-Adam Review ?"

Again, answering his friend, a student of medicine, who had tried his hand at a verse or two, as a tribute to his genius, he wrote : —

“ Dear friend and true, I take your hand,
 A hand I love to clasp,
 And welcome you to Muse's land
 With warm and hearty grasp.
 Not that you need a welcome there,
 For what you wrote to me
 Would justly claim a right to wear
 The wreath of poesy.
 But I dare trust that smile of mine
 Will never come amiss,
 Although it scarce may hope to shine
 Through fog-verse such as this.
 You have more legal right than I
 To build the lofty rhyme,
 (Though when my shingle shines on high
 I may enjoy more time),
 For Esculapius was the son
 Of golden-haired Apollo,
 And if you win the heart of one,
 The other's sure to follow.”

Lowell entered Harvard in his sixteenth year, and he has said of himself that he read every thing except the text-books prescribed by the Faculty. He was graduated in the class of 1838, and then entered the Law School, intending, like Oliver Wendell Holmes, to become a lawyer. He even went so far as to open a law-office in Boston, but it is more than suspected that one of his early attempts at fiction, bearing the title of "My First Client," referred to an entirely imaginary person. "The old melodious lays" were still more fascinating to him than the law-books bound up in yellow sheepskin, and his circumstances were so easy that he was not forced to continue work that was distasteful to him.

He published a little book of verse, and when he was twenty-four he started a magazine; but, though neither the book nor the magazine met with success, he soon afterwards proved that by the closing of the little office and Blackstone's Commentaries, literature had gained more than law had lost.

Elmwood is still the home of Mr. Lowell when he is in the United States, and though many of the birds have now disappeared, the herons which lingered in its shade were made the subject of one of Longfellow's last poems:—

" Warm and still is the summer night,
As here by the river's brink I wander,
White overhead the stars, and white
The glimmering lamps on the hillside yonder.

162 BOYHOOD OF LIVING AUTHORS.

"Silent are all the sounds of day ;
    Nothing I hear but the chirp of crickets,
And the cry of the herons winging their way
    O'er the poet's house in the Elmwood thickets.

"Call to him, herons, as slowly you pass
    To your roosts in the haunts of the exiled thrushes ;
Sing him the song of the green morass,
    And the tides that water the reeds and rushes.

. . . . .
"Sing to him, say to him, here at his gate,
    Where the boughs of the stately elms are meeting,
Some one hath lingered to meditate, "
    And send him unseen this friendly greeting ;

"That many another hath done the same,
    Though not by a sound was the silence broken :
The surest pledge of a deathless name
    Is the silent homage of thoughts unspoken."

HJALMAR HJORTH BOYESEN.

IN a capital story by Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, called "A Norseman's Pilgrimage," there is a chapter headed "Retrospect;" and if any one wishes to learn something about the youth of the author, he cannot do better than read that, for I have good reason to know that it is autobiographical.

"Olaf Varberg was by birth a Norwegian. His childhood had been spent in the fjords of Norway, where the grand solemnity of nature had tended to foster a certain brooding disposition of mind. Every hill, every stone, and every tree was a monument of past heroism, or at least to his wakeful sense suggested some untold record of the Norseman's forgotten glory. Not a hundred steps from his home stood King Bele's venerable tomb; and on this very strand, where so often he had sat pensively gazing down into the blue deep, it was that Frithjof landed in the summer nights, and hastened to those forbidden meetings with his beloved in Balder's grove; and not very far from the house there was a huge birch which certainly must have been centuries old. It grew upon a green hillock which the boy fancied looked like a tomb. Here under this tree he had spent perhaps the happiest moments of his life. In the long, light summer evenings, he would sit there for hours listening to the strange, soft melodies of the wind as it breathed through the full-leaved crown.

"He felt sure that it was a scald who was buried here; for in the songs of the wind he had seemed to recognize the same strain that had rung in his ears so often while reading the scaldic lays in the old sagas. Then strange emotions would thrill through his breast; he felt that he was himself a scald, and that he was destined to revive the expiring song and the half-forgotten traditions of the great old time.

"When he was twelve years old he had himself written a long poem which he had entitled 'The Saga of the Scald.' He had only ventured to read it to his grandmother ; but she had cried over it for a whole day, and that he felt to be a great reward."

Although all this is said of Olaf Varberg, the fictitious character, it is true of Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, as is much more in the same chapter ; though his father was not killed in the war, but is still alive.

Mr. Boyesen was born on Sept. 23, 1848, at Fredricksvern, a small seaport on the southern coast of Norway. "Why cannot the Scandinavian Peninsula sail?" is an old conundrum ; to which the answer is, "Because it was launched with the keel up." A huge granite ridge runs north and south, separating Norway from Sweden, with ribs of rock springing from it like the ribs of a ship. The sea flows in between the ribs, and the gulfs and bays thus shut in by the mountains are the fjords, amid the majestic scenery of which the boyhood of Mr. Boyesen was passed.

"How often," he says, "have I drifted through the spacious summer days in my sharp-keeled wherry, upon those light, glittering waters, while the seabirds surged in airy waves above me, and the white clouds with a bewildering distinctness pursued their tranquil paths far down in the deep below! It gave one a feeling of being suspended in the midst of the vast blue space, hovering between two infinities; and it seemed at the moment often hard to determine whether the real heavens were above or below. Then to watch the subtle play of color, how the lucid green vies with the feebler air-tints; to listen with luxurious listlessness to the musical plashing of the water against the bow; to follow the placid soaring of the large, white-breasted sea-gulls, as they float on broad, motionless wings, through the viewless ether; and to feel all the while the vast presence of the heaven-piercing peaks and glaciers, like a huge, dim background, upon which your sensations trace themselves in a deliciously vague and rich relief,—ah! it is the perfection of pure and simple being, one of those moments when the mere fact of living seems a great and glorious thing."

"I remember how as a boy my whole being thrilled with the proud consciousness that I was a Norseman, a Goth of the pure old stock, a descendant of those daring Vikings who conquered Normandy and England, and who spread the terror of their name even to Italy and Constantinople."

His mother died while he was still young, and he was brought up by her father, Judge Hjorth of Systrand. His most pronounced trait at this period was his love of animals: he had several hundred pigeons, and besides these a lot of rabbits, dogs, cows, and even horses. All his pigeons were named after characters in the books he read, both historic and fictitious; and in his imagination they repeated the adventures ascribed to the originals.

There was an old tenant on the estate, named Gunnar, who took a great fancy to the boy, and initiated him into all the mysteries of wood-craft. He knew every sight and sound in the woods, and what they meant. Sometimes the boy spent entire nights with him in the woods, sleeping in the mountain chalêts or "saeters," in order to be in time for the birds and beasts that came to drink at the springs and lakes in the mornings. As a result, his senses were as alert as those of an Indian, and he was a good shot and an expert fisherman. Signs of the weather, the proper season of the year and time of day for all kinds of game, the best way of making flies for trout, — such things as these were quite familiar to the boy, who wandered through the forests of spruce, fir, birch, and hemlock, on the steep slopes of the fjords, with old Gunnar.

“ I assure you,” said Mr. Boyesen to me one day, “ that I have never since had so keen an enjoyment of life as I had then. I need only shut my eyes to see the clear mountain tarns at sunrise, where the fish leaped in the sun, or the dark rivers at night where we went trout-fishing, and the great splashes in the stream as the line flew off the reel. By the way, have you ever sat through the night at a lonely river, and seen the otter go a-fishing? He plumps so quietly into the stream, and you see nothing but perhaps a little black moving speck, and the gleam of his eyes, and his long whiskers."

It was a rule in Judge Hjorth's house, that the children should go to bed at nine o'clock ; but the servants' hall had an irresistible attraction for Hjalmar (whose name, and many other Norse names, will not be so difficult to pronounce, by the way, if the reader will remember that the j is sounded like the y in "yacht" and "Yankee.") Hjalmar loved to sit up, and listen to the rough peasant dialect of the servants as they sang ballads, and told stories of trolls and brownies, and the achievements of their ancestors. In spite of all prohibitions he could not keep away from this enchanted world ; and he confesses that often after having kissed his grandfather and grandmother "good night," he would steal down into the kitchen, and sit spell-bound, gazing and listening, until his disobedience was discovered, and he was ignominiously undressed and put to bed.

The day came for him to leave home to go to school in the city, but when his trunk had been packed, and the steamer was due,

he could not be found. Messengers were sent hither and thither; they searched every nook and corner, and shouted his name, without getting any answer. The household was distracted. The steamer loomed up in the fjord, and slowly came to the landing. Still the boy did not return. He had been seen in the morning, on the pier, and boats were sent out with dragnets to search for him in the water. There was no trace of him there. At last one of the dairymaids suggested that he might have gone to the pasture where the calves were kept, to say good-by to the cattle; and there, sure enough, he was discovered, with his arms around the neck of a calf, over which he was weeping bitter tears. He had started out to say farewell to all his pets on the estate, and had been so overcome with grief at having to leave this particular calf, which had been given to him, that he had forgotten all about the steamer, which lay shrieking impatiently, and belching forth smoke, in the fjord.

His incurable homesickness made his school life miserable, although he was amply able to hold his own with the other boys, who had a great respect for his knowledge of fishing and hunting and all those things that he had learned in his excursions with Gunnar. Those excursions, with all their sights and sounds,—the rainbow flicker of the trout, the ripples in the otter's wake, the music of the waterfalls, the calm twilight of the woods, the scent of the pines,—came back to him now in such vivid sensations that he could not apply himself to his books; but he had so much natural aptitude, that, though he rarely took up a lesson until it was within a few minutes of the time to recite it, he managed to keep about the middle of his class, and occasionally advanced towards the top on account of the literary ability of his compositions. These were the only exercises that interested him in the beginning, but the praise he received for them gradually aroused his ambition in other directions.

He was a plucky boy, and was not without some "noble scars." There was a feud of ancient standing between the boys of the Latin School and those who did not rejoice in a classical education, and a Latin-School boy who ventured upon hostile territory was sure to be pounced upon by the "plebs" and unmercifully beaten if he was not able to defend himself. Boyesen had no fear of these encounters, and often sought them, though he was now and then routed in the fortunes of war.

During the summer vacations he returned to his beautiful home on the Sognefjord, making the journey on foot, — a distance of nearly two hundred miles, — with a knapsack on his back, at a season of the year when the country was 'at its loveliest; and thus he was enabled to renew his acquaintance with peasant life, and to listen again to the legends that had charmed him in the servants' hall.

He did not like city life, or the ancient languages which he had to learn at school; and he sought relief in his compositions. He wrote the most blood-curdling tragedies and romances; and like Olaf Varberg, the hero of "A Norseman's Pilgrimage," he found an appreciative listener in his grandmother. After seeing "Hamlet" for the first time at the Christiania Theatre, he wrote a play in which the hero was killed in the first act and re-appeared as a ghost in the remaining four acts: even thus did his juvenile imagination parody Shakespeare's greatest work! But his talent was genuine, and only needed direction and development to rise above such imitative efforts as these; though the only encouragement he received was from his grandmother.

"Norway is too small a country to support poets," his father said. "If you are serious in your aspirations to become a man of letters," he added, "you ought to conquer a language in which you can address the great world,—English, French, or German,—that is, if you have any thing to say which the world will care to listen to."

His father had a restless and ambitious spirit, which rebelled against the slow and conservative methods of Norway. He had been to America, and he liked this country better than his own, and thought that it would be well for his sons if they would come here. He had even deposited a sum of money with a friend in Chicago, which was to be paid to any one of his sons who should appear to claim it in person.

Hjalmar himself was as eager to try his fortunes in the new country as his father was to have him; but Judge Hjorth violently opposed the idea at first, though afterwards, when the boy had taken his degree at the university, the old gentleman yielded to his persuasions. This was in 1868, when Hjalmar was only twenty years old; and though his intention on starting out was to return to Norway in a year, he found the United States so attractive that he made this country his home.

For a time he was employed in editing a Scandinavian paper; then he became a teacher; and he acquired the language so rapidly, that at the end of two years he was able to write a book which is a model of racy and vigorous English. He was not without homesickness, and it was natural that in composing this book his thoughts should go back to the deep, mountain-clasped fjords, and the high valleys, sheltered in which he had so often sat before the peasant's fire listening to the legends of the wonderful North-land. Gunnar came back to his mind, and he gave that name to his hero, though the latter had not at all the character of the old woodman.

The originality and power of the book were recognized at once: it was full of life and motion, and gave one the sensation of walking side by side with a vigorous companion, across some clear upland on an exhilarating autumn morning. Here was an author who had new stories to tell, and who could tell them so well that the pulse of the listener bounded in unison with his, in watching the movements of his characters. Norway had given America a new novelist.

Since then Mr. Boyesen has fortified his position in literature by many delightful books, all glowing with nervous vitality and sparkling like the water in his native cascades. So many of them are there, that an ordinary writer might point to them alone in proof of his industry; but their production has been merely a recreation to him, and the greater part of his time is given to the duties of a professorship in Columbia College, New York.

How "Gunnar" found a publisher, he has told us as follows:—

"One day in July, 1871, I happened to be in the Harvard College Library, Cambridge. Professor Ezra Abbot, who was then assistant librarian, begged me to write my name in the visitors' book. He became interested in it, philologically. He asked about my nationality, and, hearing that I was a Norseman, begged leave to make me acquainted with Professor Child, who just then was in need of a Norseman.

"Professor Child was sent for and arrived. He gave me Landstadt's collection of Norwegian ballads, and begged me read and translate a number of passages which he had marked. He was then at work upon his great book on ballads, two volumes of which have now appeared. We spent the whole afternoon reading Norse ballads written in different dialects which were all familiar to me.

"When we parted, Professor Child exclaimed, 'You have a lot of valuable material in your possession. Why don't you make use of it? It would make an interesting article.'

"I replied that I had written something. He begged me to bring the MS. to him, and a few days later I was invited to dine at his house. Howells was among the guests ; he was then editor of 'The Atlantic.' After dinner I was requested to read a portion of my MS. ; and I selected the chapter on the 'Skee Race,' and, being asked for more, read the chapter entitled 'The Wedding of the Wild Duck.'

"Howells became greatly interested ; begged me to spend a couple of days at his house as his guest, and read the rest of the tale. This invitation was accepted, and likewise the MS.

"It was this incident which had the most decisive influence upon my life, as it was probably the cause of my remaining in this country. I then became acquainted with Mr. Longfellow, Mr. Lowell, Henry James, Jr., and others. It changed the face of the United States to me, and launched me fairly upon my career as a man of letters."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

THE quaint old village, with its straggling houses, and deep shade and quietude, which Lowell pictures for us as the Cambridge of his youth, was the scene of the boyhood of Thomas Wentworth Higginson also; and he too, though four years the junior of Lowell, was among the eager boys who buzzed around the door of the wonderful barber's shop, described in "Fireside Travels," where tomahawks and weapons from the antipodes hung upon the wall, and a parrot harangued the spectators and the customers in a gibberish which the barber said was the Hottentot language.

He went to the same school as Lowell, and sat under the same frowning eye, though the poet, who, as he says, seemed "immeasurably ancient," had been transferred to college; and his earliest recollections are of the library in the gambrel-roofed house where Oliver Wendell Holmes was born, and where he was as much at home as in his father's house, which adjoined that celebrated dwelling.

He was born in an atmosphere of learning and literature; the walls of the house seemed to be made of books, and when he looked out of the windows, the college buildings were visible to remind him of further learning still. If ever a boy could claim to belong to the "academic races," as Dr. Holmes calls the families whose names have appeared generation after generation on the college rolls, it was Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who came of a long line of Puritanic clergymen and scholars, and who was himself born at the head of a street called Professors' Row (now Kirkland Street) because all the houses were occupied by professors in the neighboring university, of which his own father was the steward or bursar. The society in which his parents moved was intellectual, and many of their visitors were famous, like Edward Everett the orator,

Judge Story, and Margaret Fuller. Even his nurse added something to the influence of the literary current into which he was plunged, for she was Rowena Pratt, the wife of the original of Longfellow's "Village Blacksmith."

It would have been easy to make such surroundings odious to a boy, for a diet of learning alone is quite as likely to excite repugnance as a diet of pudding. Books may be as darkening as prison-bars, and they may be as full of sunlight and enchanting hues as windows filled with cathedral glass; the difference depends partly on the boy himself, and partly on the manner in which he is educated. Thomas Wentworth Higginson was a born scholar, however, and in the reminiscences of his youth, books are not associated with confinement and restraint, but with pleasures as keen as any he found in the playground; he never sighed to escape from them, but derived from them all the delights which they possess for the boy who loves them. Even his Latin text-book had charms for him, as he has shown us in one of his many graceful essays. "I remember the very day when the school-master gave it to me," he says. "He was that vigorous, rigorous, kind-hearted, thorough-bred Englishman, W. W. It was the beginning of a new school-year. Lowell, and Story, and the other old boys, who seemed so immeasurably ancient, had been transferred to college, and last year's youngest class was at length youngest but one, and ready for the 'New Latin Tutor.' Then W. W. called us to his desk, and opening it, — I can hear the very rattle of the birch, as it rolled back from the up-lifted lid, — he brought out for us these books, in all the glory of fresh calf binding, and gave each volume into trembling boyish hands. To some of us there was more of birch than of bounty in the immediate associations of that desk; and I fancy that we always trembled a little when we had a new book, as if all the proverbial floggings which it might involve were already tingling between its covers. Yet those of us whose love of the book was wont to save us from the rod, may have felt the thrill of delight predominate; at any rate, there was novelty, and the 'joy of eventful living,' and I remember that the rather stern and aquiline face of our teacher relaxed into mildness for a moment. But we and our books must have looked very fresh and new to him, though we may all be a little battered now; at least, my 'New Latin Tutor' is. The change undergone by the volume which Browning put in the plum-tree cleft, to be read only by newts and beetles, —

"With all the binding all of a blister,
And great blue spots where the ink has run,
And reddish streaks that wink and glister," —

could hardly exceed what this book shows, when I fish it up from a chest of literary lumber coeval with itself. It would smell musty, doubtless, to any nose unregulated by a heart; but to me it is redolent of the alder-blossoms of boyish springs, and the aromatic walnut odor which used in autumn to pervade the dells of 'Sweet Auburn,' that lay not so very far from our schoolhouse. It is a very precious book, and it should be robed in choice Turkey morocco, were not the very covers too much a part of the association to be changed. For between them I gathered the seed-grain of many harvests of delight; through this low archway I first looked upon the immeasurable beauty of words."

In his own house there was a library rich in the literature of the age of Queen Anne; and when he was tired of reading himself, his mother read to him, while he stretched himself out on the hearth-rug and gazed into the fire. The library in the minister's house next door was open to him also, — that fascinating place which the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" (then a student of medicine) has described for us in both prose and verse; the old gambrel-roofed house, with the picture of Dorothy Q., and the marks of the redcoats' muskets on the floor.

The father of the "Autocrat" was fond of his neighbor's children, as well as of his own, and, without a murmur of complaint, allowed them to romp in his library among the books, which were as varied in their uniforms as the members of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company. Once, when the weather was cold, he joined them at the window where they stood admiring the traceries of frost on the panes; and, seeing the twinkling points of light among the crystals, he wrote underneath a motto which remained with them as though the words had been cut in their memories rather than in the vanishing frost, — Per aspera ad astra, — which they all knew meant "Through difficulties to the stars."

Though a bookish boy, Thomas Wentworth Higginson was as vigorous as any dunce; but he was precocious, and though only thirteen years of age when he entered Harvard College, he looked much older. The studiousness of his earlier years was not abated now, and at a time when most boys are only freshmen, or at preparatory schools, he was graduated. Curiously enough he was fond of mathematics, which are usually the aversion of students of literary tastes; but literature had the greatest charm for him, and during his college years a group of new authors came into prominence who had a lifelong influence upon him as upon the rest of the world. "Tennyson's thin early volumes were being handed about, and seemed to bring a richer coloring into the universe; Carlyle was talked of in the evening by my elder brothers; and one day the fresh wit and wisdom of 'Pickwick' came to delight us all. . . . Emerson had often lectured at Cambridge, and his volume of essays had just appeared. This was given to me by my mother, and was read as I never had read any other book."

After his graduation, the young student said that he would like to be a blacksmith, — thinking that by working at the forge and anvil he could learn how to sympathize with that great division of mankind which such as he usually know only through books; but he was dissuaded from this, and became a teacher, a preacher, and an author. Perhaps it is as an author that he is most distinguished now, but we ought not to forget, in enumerating his accomplishments, that "Colonel" is not a brevet honor in his case, and that it was honorably acquired in the Civil War when he commanded a black regiment.

EDGAR FAWCETT.

THOUGH there are many authors who, like Thackeray and George Eliot, have not done their best work until middle age, it is not often that the literary faculty hides itself under a bushel in youth. Indeed, it is much more likely to be premature than deferred in its manifestations, and, disregarding cautionary preparation, to plunge the vain and giddy boy who possesses it into a sea of words before he has one buoyant thought to sustain him.

What would you have? An epic, a tragedy, a history? This daring boy in a pinafore will supplement Milton, Shakespeare, or Macaulay, at a moment's notice; and if you could gain his confidence, he would show you a tragedy modelled on "Hamlet," or an epic in which he has emulated "Paradise Lost," tucked away in a corner of his desk, with such treasures as marbles, tops, and kite-strings.

There are few authors who have not some fatuity of this kind to recall. Aldrich, at thirteen, had spun out a wonderful romance; and Howells, at an earlier age, had produced a tragedy in five acts, of blank verse.

The poet and novelist, Edgar Fawcett, was still nearer infancy when he wrote his first novel. "I could not have been much over nine years old when I conceived the idea of composing a story," he says in a pleasant chapter of autobiography. "I remember its name perfectly. I called it 'Mrs. Morse; or, A Widow's Trials.' At this time I had a mania for names, and on the first foolscap page of my maiden manuscript I placed eighteen, — feminine and masculine. They designated the half-orphan progeny of my heroine, Mrs. Morse. She had been left with them at the opening of the tale, and she was supporting them (Walter, Olivia, Julian, Claribel, Harold, and thirteen others) under circumstances of the most poignant want."

Two things are apparent in this extract: the young author's scorn of probability, and his taste for names made familiar by the old romances.

He was a whimsical sort of boy, and his head was full of strange fancies. He had a passion for reading European history, for one curious purpose — to find out all about the queens of various nations. "I shall never forget the delight with which I devoured Agnes Strickland's 'Queens of England,'" he once told the writer of this sketch. "I had been thirsting for knowledge of queens for months before I discovered that this book existed, and it seemed to drop upon me from heaven. I used up numberless paint-boxes and reams of cardboard in painting portraits, altogether imaginary, of French, Spanish, and English queens; and my sisters pelted me with girlish sarcasm, which I hotly resented."

He was more ambitious to be an artist than an author at this time, and though his sisters scoffed at him, his father looked with approval on his efforts. Presently, however, this encouragement was withdrawn. His father took him aside, and said to him, "My son, I am sorry to say that you are wasting unprofitable hours in these sketches of yours. I had hoped that it might mean a possession, on your part, of some slight natural talent; but I find, to my regret, that you do not give evidence of any talent whatever. Take my advice, and discontinue your painting."

The boy was deeply mortified, and these sensible words only aroused his obstinacy. He continued to paint, though after a while he took his father's advice.

His father was a leather-merchant, an Englishman of scholarly tastes, and his mother belonged to a patrician American family. They moved in the fashionable society of New York, and their children had a luxurious home, and the best of teachers.

The first instruction Edgar, their only son, received, was from a governess; and then he went from one school to another, until he entered Columbia College, at the age of sixteen. Though sensitive and imaginative, he was a hard student, and always stood high in his class. He hated figures, but history, geography, and spelling were easy to him. "I never remember learning to spell," he tells us. "I seemed to spell naturally, without the least tuition; and my teachers were often astonished by this faculty in me." His literary tastes were romantic. He devoured all of Bulwer's novels, and hundreds of books of a similar character. Scott was his favorite poet, and Moore stood next in his esteem. He had a great love for Cowper's "Lines on His Mother's Picture," and he also loved Shakspeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream," and could recite all of Puck's quaint speeches from memory. But that book which is usually more fascinating to a boy than all others — "Robinson Crusoe" — had scarcely any attraction for him, though similar books, like "The Swiss Family Robinson," and "Masterman Ready," delighted him. Capt. Mayne Reid was another of his favorite authors, and this makes it seem all the stranger that he missed the charm of "Robinson Crusoe."

His reading was so various, and so much like that of other boys, that it did not serve as an indication of the special character of his own abilities ; but after giving up his painting he went to work harder than ever with his pen. "When I had reached the manly age of eleven," he says, "I had begun to look with amused scorn upon the literary follies of my boyhood ; my stories were now written in copy-books, and it is extraordinary how many copy-bookfuls of fiction I produced during the next two years. On the reverse pages of those thin pamphlets I would announce new works as 'in preparation,' or, 'shortly to appear,' imitating the advertisements of contemporary publishers. But alas ! even the very titles of these stories are mostly forgotten. Now and then recollection serves me, however, when I strive to review their vanished glories. One copy-book story I clearly remember. . . . It was called 'Rosa : a Tale of Spain and Portugal.' I wrote the title before I wrote the story, — as was usually my custom. The hero (whose name, I believe, was Don Alonzo) had passed several chapters of existence in Spain, when I suddenly recollected that my narrative was also to deal with Portugal. Disheartened but not crushed by this consideration, I promptly put Don Alonzo on board of a ship, wrecked him disastrously after a day or two of seafaring, and made him swim through a portion of the Bay of Biscay until he reached the Portuguese shore. Here ended my first copy-book. The second copy-book dealt with Portugal, since my hero had been safely landed there; and so, while filling it, I felt that I was conscientiously meeting the demand of a large and exacting future public."

He wrote verse as well as prose, and the former was the medium of his first appearance in print, — that thrilling event which always seems to place the young author somewhere near the sun, and to put a crown upon his head, and flowers under his feet. His father had a hobby which was represented by a certain weekly paper to which he subscribed, and to the editor of this Edgar sent his verses. A week or two later they appeared; but he did not rush off and show them to his family. No, his fame was to be a secret enjoyed only by himself.

“So, like the silly ostrich that I was,” he says, “I hid my head in the sand with a vengeance. I tore or cut the little poem out of the paper. My father came up from town, eager for the publication which he was always first to read. The mutilated page filled him with inquiries. Some one had seen me clutching the paper agitatedly and hurrying off with it. Circumstantial evidence crushed me. There was the mangled cherry-tree, and the culpable G. W. was not far off. And so with tears of shame I was forced to confess my offence and my distinction. I recall thinking that the latter was a disclosure far too lightly valued. But from that hour I was a marked boy.”

Although his father had strong literary tastes, that gentleman took a business man's view of literature as a vocation; it was well enough as a recreation or an accomplishment, but too uncertain in its rewards for a profession. He wanted his son to be a lawyer. Edgar was resolute in his choice, however: he would be an author, and nothing else.

He was graduated from Columbia College when he was twenty, and at once began to devote himself to literature. Novels, poems, plays, and essays flowed from his pen in a copious stream; some found a harbor of publicity, much more was swept out of sight and out of memory. He did not spring into a sudden success. There were times when the sun did not seem to be so near as on that day when he saw his first verses in print; and flowers, too, were out of season. But he was a youth of spirit and perseverance, believing that ladders are given us to be climbed; and he lived undaunted through many discouragements. By and by masters of literature, like Longfellow, took notice of his work; and at thirty he had established himself in a high place among the younger men of letters in America.

EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN.

LET the reader picture to himself an old man in such a costume as a prosperous lawyer would wear forty years ago, with a defiant boy standing before him. The old man is reproving, and the boy has not yet been reduced to the point of penitence.

"Come, sir," says the elder severely, wishing to show that the culprit's offence is without a parallel, "did you ever hear of any great man who ran away from home in his youth?"

"Yes," the boy blurts out to the surprise of his questioner.

"And who was it, pray?"

"Masterman Ready, sir."

"Masterman Ready" is not a name to be found in dictionaries of illustrious personages, but to the imaginative boy Capt. Marryat's hero seemed to afford a very good precedent in justification of his conduct.

The old man's sense of humor was touched ; and for some time afterwards — long enough for him to see the folly of his excuse — the boy was nicknamed " Master-man Ready."

His real name was Edmund Clarence Stedman ; and his Mentor was his great-uncle, James Stedman of Norwich, Conn., who was bringing him up.

Though born in Hartford, Conn., he was taken while an infant to Plainfield, N.J. ; and in his sixth year, when his mother, who had been widowed, married a second time, he was transferred to the care of this uncle at Norwich, where he remained until he reached the age of fifteen.

It was Norwich Town, two miles away from the city of Norwich ; a quaint old place not unlike Portsmouth, full of colonial houses, and historic families like the Huntingtons, the Trumbulls, and the Stedmans themselves. It was the birth-place of Benedict Arnold. Old traditions were believed in, and old customs observed. No town in New England celebrated Thanksgiving as Norwich Town did. Enormous bonfires were burned, such as reduced ordinary bonfires to glow-worms by comparison ; barrels strung on masts sixty feet high, begged or bought by gangs of boys in the surrounding neighborhood for months before. A capital place for any boy, one would say, and especially for a boy of an imaginative turn of mind with a taste for romance.

There were six boys in the house of James Stedman, so that there was no lack of companionship ; and a curious thing about these six boys was that they were three pairs of brothers, the elder of each pair being two years the senior of the younger, while the respective ages of each pair were alike ; or, in other words, the eldest of one pair was the same age as the eldest of the other pairs, and the age of the youngest was the same in each case also. There was not a place for berrying or nutting that they did not know, nor was there an adventure in which they did not unite. And at night, when they reached home, they sat up in bed telling stories ; and in this amusement, as in their expeditions in the woods, Edmund Clarence Stedman was the leader.

A small, active, sinewy little fellow he was, of a slender frame but great endurance, sensitive, impulsive, passionate; and though he was what may be called an out-of-door boy, rejoicing in physical exercises, — a good swimmer, a champion runner, and expert in woodcraft, into the mysteries of which he was initiated by a half-breed named Ira, — he was as eager for learning as for sport, and he stood at the head of his class in the Norwich Academy.

But despite his vitality he was not a happy boy. He had all the painful sensibilities of the poetic temperament, and often withdrew from companionship to be alone with his own thoughts. His great-uncle was a disciplinarian, a just, well-meaning but exacting man, quite incapable, apparently, of understanding the ultimate value of the fiery and imaginative character of his nephew, though he was of the greatest use to the latter in his studies, and found in him such a pupil as a thorough-going scholar loves.

Except in their love of learning they had little in common, however, and the boy rebelled against the ascetic life around him, and that bitter sectarian feeling which ran so high in Norwich Town that the young people of one denomination were forbidden to play with those of other churches. Then — and this was the principal source of his unhappiness — he was separated from his mother, and to a boy of his temperament no deprivation could be more serious than this. How pitifully his soul yearned for her through all the years he spent in Norwich Town! How in every moment of despair it seemed that only her presence was needed to make him happy, and ~~set~~ him right! How clearly she would have been able to see what all the rest misunderstood! He was much like her in his tastes, and he had inherited from her a love of poets and poetry which deepened the sympathy between them. She did not discourage or disparage the poetic faculty, as parents often wisely do. “My son, be a poet,” she said, and he hardly needed her direction, for he had begun to rhyme in infancy.

Scott, Coleridge, Shelley, Keats, and Byron cast the spell of their genius over him, and lightened the burdens of many of his weary hours.

At the age of fifteen he went to Yale, with the largest class that ever entered that college, — a class, too, that was notable for its literary ability. George W. Smalley ("G. W. S."), the London correspondent of the "Tribune;" Andrew D. White, afterwards president of Cornell University; Isaac H. Bromley, Charlton T. Lewis, and Delano Goddard, the latter three all journalists of wide reputation, — were among the members.

Here he distinguished himself by his Greek and English compositions, and took a first prize in his sophomore year. But he did not remain to graduate, though in after years the college placed him among its alumni with the degree of M.A. He wanted to see the world, and he set out in search of adventure, on an expedition which ended with less romantic results than he expected.

He wavered between the choice of literature and journalism, but the latter seemed to offer the more solid ground; and one day when he was in New York he sought an audience with Horace Greeley, who was his ideal of a great editor. Mr. Greeley sat in an armchair, reading a paper, while a shoe-black was polishing his shoes, a luxury to which, it is said, the famous journalist did not often treat himself. The boy approached timidly and reverently, and inquired whether there was any vacancy on the staff. "No, young man," was the curt reply, and this one word closed the interview as a shutter extinguishes a dancing sunbeam. The novice had been in the presence of his hero, however, and the brief speech lingered in his ear as if it had been a burst of eloquence.

The poetic quality was not an enfeebling trait in this youth. He had fine courage and manly resolution. He went back to Norwich, and at nineteen became the editor of the Norwich "Tribune," engaging his old classmate, Isaac H. Bromley, to assist him. Then he took charge of the "Herald," published at Winsted, Conn., imparting to it a dignity and an originality which country newspapers do not usually have ; and a year or two later he removed to New York, where, after a while, he found the vacancy on Horace Greeley's staff for which he had been looking.

He went to the front as war correspondent, and showed all the courage, endurance, and fertility of resource, which that post requires. Had he chosen, he might have filled the highest positions in journalism ; but literature in the form of poetry and criticism had a greater attraction for him, and his work in this direction has revealed the unusual combination of creative imagination and dispassionate judgment. All sorts of honors have come to him, but he remains a boy in the earnestness of his friendships and the freshness of his enthusiasms. His mother is an idol still, and of her he has written in one of his poems, —

“ She seemed an angel to our infant eyes !

Once when the glorifying moon revealed

Her who at evening by our pillow kneeled, —

Soft-voiced and golden-haired, from holy skies

Flown to her loves on wings of Paradise, —

We looked to see the pinions half concealed.
The Tuscan vines and olives will not yield
Her back to me, who loved her in this wise,
And since have little known her, but have grown
To see another mother tenderly
Watch over sleeping children of my own.
Perhaps the years have changed her : yet alone
This picture lingers ; still she seems to me
The fair young angel of my infancy."

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.

"ONE of the best things in the world is to be a boy. It requires no experience, though it needs some practice to be a good one. The disadvantage of the position is that it does not last long enough; it is soon over. Just as soon as you get used to being a boy, you have to be something else, with a good deal more work to do, and not half so much fun."

This is said by Charles Dudley Warner, in a delightful little volume called "Being a Boy," the copy of which that lies before me, borrowed from the public library, bears on its titlepage the pencilled comments of two previous readers, in schoolboy hand: "Putty gud book," "Rawther Sawcastick."

It is a "putty gud book," and it is "rawther sawcastick;" it leaves nothing unsaid that is worth knowing about the life of a boy on a New-England farm, and it is as natural and as shyly humorous as Aldrich's history of Tom Bailey at Rivermouth. No doubt those who have read it, or who may read it in the future, will be glad to know that it is in a measure autobiographical; that in writing it, Mr. Warner sat for his own portrait, and painted what he saw in the looking-glass.

He was born on Sept. 12, 1827, in Plainfield, Mass., a hilly town in the western part of the State, where his father had a farm of about six hundred acres, with large flocks of sheep and herds of cattle; and his boyhood was like that of the typical farmer's boy who appears in his book, though in his case the labor and the trials were sweetened by a love of Nature, which gathered something more than physical enjoyment from his surroundings.

The summer soon passed away, and the winters seemed to be never-ending on that lofty plateau. The snows drifted high above the fences, and sleighs could go anywhere over the fields. The winds blew strong; and once, when Charles Dudley Warner started across the solid shining crust of the snow for the schoolhouse that was about half a mile away, with his dinner-basket in his hand, and a red cloak drawn around him, the tempest reversed the fable, and snatched both basket and cloak away from him, carrying them off into the forest, where they were not recovered until the following spring.

He hated cold, and says now that the so-called invigorating climate of New England fills the graveyard with young tenants; but sometimes he could forget it, as when, having an apple to eat, he came home from school on a bitter day without noticing that the flaps of his cap were loose, and that his ears were frozen.

The house was an old-fashioned place, with rambling woodsheds and out-buildings, and a big kitchen. There were no stoves, but great cavernous fireplaces, hedged in by settles, the backs of which protected the family from draughts when they sat before the blazing fire. One curious article of furniture was a round table with a seat under it, and when the top was swung back it formed another settle.

A glorious place this kitchen was on a winter's evening. Stories were told, and songs sung, and it was the scene of Whittier's "Snow-bound" over again.

"Between the andiron's straddling feet,
The mug of cider simmered slow,
The apples sputtered in a row,
And close at hand the basket stood
With nuts from brown October's wood."

And in addition to the cider, the nuts, and the apples, there were dishes of toasted cheese of a particular kind called "white oak," which was made from skimmed milk, and which would toast without melting. An enormous cellar was underneath the kitchen, full of cider-barrels, vegetables, and apples, which grew in abundance on the farm.

The principal events of the year were the cider-making in the fall, and the sugar-making in the spring. There were fine groves of sugar-maples on the farm; and in March or April, when the skies began to have a soft look and the steely light of winter to grow more like gold, when there was a constant drip, drip, drip, from the eaves, and the elbows of the rocks showed through the white garment that was slipping away from them, the trees were tapped, and the buckets hung from them to catch the oozing sap. A camp was established in the woods, and all the family would be there for the "sugaring-off," which was done in the primitive way, with a big fire between two logs and the caldrons hung from a pole above. They make sugar now in brick houses, with elaborate apparatus; but, though the product is said to be improved, it is not half as sweet as it was at the old-fashioned "sugaring-off" with the logs blazing in the woods and the merry-making of former days, — the days of fifty years ago when Charles Dudley Warner was a boy.

Of course he knew something about traps, and trapping too; and he was devoted to the "hired man" who taught him how to make and use various kinds of snares. He used to go to bed and get up with this man, and help him to build the great fire, first raking the embers and then piling the sticks high up: it used to take a quarter of a cord of wood to build that fire.

Oh the winters, the everlasting winters! Often the snow would be heaped up in drifts higher than the windows, and a permanent tunnel had to be made from the house to the barn. The cellar was as dark as midnight, for tan-bark was banked all around the house to keep out the besieging cold.

Occasionally his father took him on journeys: once to the Connecticut River, and he craned his neck out of the window to see Sugar Loaf Mountain. It was in vain, for all the hills were more or less round and green, and there was not one that looked at all like the conical loaf of sugar which they had at home. And then his grandfather took him to the city, not New York City, or Boston, or any large city, but to Hudson; which, small as it was, struck him as no other place has ever done since. The fruit-stalls are remembered more vividly than any thing else, and a man at one of the stalls offered to trade an orange for all the buttons on his coat; he was afraid of that man.

Though active, he was an imaginative and a dreamy boy, and his fancy transformed the common sights of the woods and fields to objects of chivalry and romance as he leaped from rock to rock in the high pastures ; he was not afraid of being alone, though there seemed to be strange voices in the trees.

When he was five years old he lost his father, who, though not a college-bred man, was fond of reading, and owned the largest library in the town excepting the minister's ; and then he was sent to live with a relative at Charlemont, nine miles from Plainfield, where he attended the district school. It is Charlemont that is described in " Being a Boy."

He was a pretty fair scholar, but the " chores " took most of his time, and books were scarce. Had he been able to choose, he would have entered on a military career. But when he was about twelve he went to live at Cazenovia, N.Y., and there his literary tastes were encouraged by access to the books for which he had been starving. He was a clever hand at composition, and took Washington Irving as a model. His guardian intended him for trade, however; and for a time he was employed in a drug-shop, and then in the post-office. Afterwards he entered Hamilton College, from which he was graduated in 1851. He filled reams of paper with rhymes, essays, and romances, and was always active in the debating society. But he had no idea of becoming a professional author. Having given up his military aspirations, he turned his eyes towards public life; speech-making seemed to be a great accomplishment, and a Congressman a star of considerable magnitude. This dream of glory was not fulfilled; his health was poor after his graduation, and in order to restore it he went to Missouri with a party of surveyors. After this adventure he studied law, and practised a little in Chicago; but at last (though not until he was thirty-one) he took up journalism as a profession, and eventually, like Howells and Stedman, branched out in the direction of more permanent literature.

His books sometimes remind us of Holmes by their philosophical playfulness; of Lamb by the quaintness of their humor; of Irving by their placidity; and of Steele or Addison by the purity of their style. They have a surface of smiles, but under the smiles are the deep thoughts of an earnest nature.

The Blind Brother deals with life in the coal-mining region of the Wyoming Valley, and is remarkable for its dramatic intensity, power of characterization, humor and pathos."

"There are 4,000,000 boys in the United States from 10 to 16 years of age. This story was written for them. We wish every one of the number to read it. A style of writing more simple, clear, direct, forcible, and attractive could not be desired."—National Republican, Washington, D. C.
